A BID FOR SOLDIERS' VOTES

THE BOURBONS AND THE REPUBLICAN BOUNTY LAWS.

HOW BOUNTY AND BACK-PAY CLAIMS HAVE BEEN DELAYED—AN ATTEMPT TO FASTEN THE RESPONSIBILITY ON THE REPUBLICANS—THE RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 1.—No other act of the Democratic majority during the recent session of Congress was so characteristic and contemptible as the attempt to fasten upon Republican executive officers the responsibility for the delay in the settlement of claims for bounty and back pay and the payment of money due to soldiers, their widows, or their orphans. The pickpocket, trying to escape with his plunder, joins in the cry of "Stop thief!" for the purpose of fixing the attention of his pursuers upon some other person; so the Democrats in Congress, conscious that the delay in question was caused by their action, and by that alone, try to escape righteous condemnation and to throw the blame upon the party which has always been the soldier's friend. The attempt was made by Representative Alexander H. Coffroth, of the Seventeenth District of Pennsylvania, the special champion on the floor of the House of the bill to pension all Confederate soldiers who served in the Mexican war, and he was supported in the attempt by his party. The technicalities of legislation conceal from the public eye the real causes of the delay, so that Mr. Coffroth could regard with complacency his hypocritical bid for the votes of soldiers, knowing that the information which would reveal the character of his complaint could not secure the wide circulation which his complaint obtained, and would in most cases fail to meet the eyes of those directly interested in the subject. The facts given below should be carefully considered by every soldier. They will soon be embodied in a statement to be prepared for circulation by the Republican Congressional Committee as a complete refutation of the miserable slander of which Mr. Coffroth and the Democrats in Congress have been guilty. The following preamble and resolution were reported to the House for adoption April 26, 1880, by Mr. Coffroth, Chairman of the Committee on Pensions and of the Committee on Bounty and Back Pay:

Whereas, There is great and just complaint being constantly made by soldiers on account of the long delay, in many instances nearly a year, in the payment of the bounty and back pay settled and allowed by the Third Second Auditor of the Treasury; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested and directed to inform the House of Representatives the cause of delay in paying bounty and back pay from date to date to soldiers and their heirs entitled thereto, and why it is that he permits these claims to remain unpaid from six to twelve months before he asks Congress for an appropriation of money to the pay same.

This preamble and resolution were adopted, and in due time the Secretary made answer, the substance of which was published in THE TIMES immediately thereafter. This answer, like the answer to Mr. Speer's inquiry in relation to the moonshiners of Georgia, was not palatable to Democrats, and was, therefore, allowed to go the way of other executive documents for which the Democrats had no use. Mr. Coffroth knew that the answer would give him no comfort, but in the resolution he had shot his arrow, and in that had accomplished his purpose. His position as Chairman of the Committee on Bounty and Back Pay made it impossible for him to be ignorant of the real causes of the delay, and he could easily have risen in his place and described them. That course, however, would not have aided his party, and would have shown the resolution's real intent. It would have shown to the soldiers and their heirs who look to a Republican Administration for their dues, and whose indignation he sought to excite, that the delay was the result of compliance with a Democratic law which the Treasury Department could not set aside. The facts will plainly reveal this to the soldier whose claim for bounty or back pay has lain in a department pigeonhole, awaiting the procrastination and ill-will of the party which he fought on the battlefields of the late war, and which now asks him to vote for Hancock and English, the candidates of the Southern Brigadiers.

At the beginning of President Grant's first Administration, June 30, 1869, there were on file in the Treasury Department 66,186 claims for bounty and back pay. Between that date and June 30, 1874, there were received 134,061 more, making a total of 200,247. The settlement of these claims was the chief duty of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, and so energetically was it performed that he was able to report June 30, 1874, that only 25,038 of these claims remained on hand. Seven-eighths of them had been settled. This rapid adjustment of these claims was due, in great measure, to the aid furnished by a Republican Congress. The party which had carried on the war, and stood by the soldier while it continued, did not desert him when gratitude became its duty. Appropriations were promptly and cheerfully granted, legislation smoothed away difficulties which confronted deserving claimants, and laws which included meritorious cases not provided for in existing statutes were perfected without delay. The Executive and Legislative branches of the Government vied with each other in acts of national gratitude and justice.

Congress passed an act June 20, 1874, requiring that all remainders of appropriations which should at the end of two years be unexpended should be returned to the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year. This was done for the purpose of bringing expenditures more directly under Congressional supervision, and in the interest of economy. When money once appropriated by Congress has been returned to the Treasury in this way it becomes part of the Government's funds, and cannot be taken out again except by another appropriation act of Congress. In order that the public business should not suffer by this new requirement, the law also provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should report to Congress at the beginning of each session how much of this money was needed to pay accruing obligations, so that the amount needed might be reappropriated. In this way delay was prevented in the settlement of soldiers' bounty and back pay claims by a Republican Congress, and one of the last acts of that Congress was the reappropriation, March 3 1875, of $534,147 28 to pay "bounty to volunteers, their widows, and legal heirs," and $597,498 40 for "pay of two and three years volunteers." This money was at once available for use in settling claims of this kind. It is plain that there was no desire for delay in paying the soldier's dues in those days.

At the next session the Democrats had a large majority in the House. Knowing that they were not strong enough to follow their real inclinations in legislation, they did not seriously oppose the passage of a Republican bill which reappropriated $600,946 79 for the pay of volunteers.

But soon the Brigadiers of the Confederacy and their Northern Democratic allies became strong enough in both the Senate and the House to curb the gratitude and patriotism which had poured out millions to keep the Union veterans and their families from suffering. Those who had fought behind rebel intrenchments and voted for secession ordinances found it unpleasant to be obliged, from fear of Northern sentiment, to sanction the disbursement of money to those who fought to uphold the Union. They did not dare openly to offend the soldier element, but in the feeling described above may be found the key to their subsequent obstructive legislation. This legislation and its effects were as follows: The act requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress estimates for needed reappropriations was repealed June 14, 1878, and it was then made the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury thereafter to receive, examine, and transmit the justness and validity of all claims against the United States which had been submitted, or of which, if not submitted to the Treasury, they were to notify the claimants to submit the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be by him transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with the information of such transmittal.

Speaker was to lay the report before Congress. In this way were the claimants thrown upon the mercy of the Democratic majority, and a course of procedure required which could not fail to delay payments.

The fiscal year ends June 30, and at that time the remainder of the appropriations unexpended are turned into the Treasury. There is no money available for the payment of these claims after that date, and the Secretary cannot apply to Congress for money until the beginning of the session. The session does not begin until December. After his application has been made, in the form of an estimate, it must be referred to a committee. The committee may hold it under consideration for a long time, and when at last the appropriation bill gets out of the committee and into the House, its passage is delayed by long debates. Only at the end of the session can the money be obtained, and some accident may postpone action upon the bill until the next session. Generally the next June 30 is at hand—and it may have passed—before the money is given with which the claims can be paid. In this way have the Democrats withheld the money, and then they have had the impudence to ask why there has been delay in the payments.

The records show how these Democratic provisions have caused delay. In accordance with them, the Secretary reported to the Speaker Jan. 16, 1879, in regard to the sum needed for the soldiers' claims. It was not until March 3, 1879, that this sum was appropriated, just at the end of the session. The claims were adjusted and awaiting settlement when the year began, June 30, 1878, but there was no money to be used for the purpose. The money was not given until March 3, 1879, so that the Democrats compelled the claimants to wait more than eight months. The Secretary reported again Jan. 16, 1880, but this time the money was not given by the Democrats until June 16, 1880, so that in this case a delay of nearly a year (June 30, 1879, to June 16, 1880,) was caused by the working of this law and by the sluggish action of the Democratic majority. It was in the interval before the passage of the appropriation bill that Mr. Coffroth secured the passage of his resolution asking why there was delay, when he knew that the delay had been caused entirely by him and his Democratic friends, and that the application was then awaiting action.

The Democratic Party, through Mr. Coffroth, asked the Secretary why he permitted these claims to remain unpaid from 6 to 12 months before asking for an appropriation. Mr. Coffroth and the party well knew that five months must elapse between the end of the fiscal year and the beginning of the session of Congress before the Secretary could ask; that Congress adjourned for the Christmas holidays almost immediately after organization, and that usually the middle of January is reached before legislative work is begun. It was on Jan. 16, in both 1879 and 1880, that the Secretary did ask for an appropriation. Mr. Coffroth and his party know that nearly seven months must elapse after the allowance of these claims before the application for money could get before the proper Congressional committee, (the reference to a committee in 1880 was made Jan. 26,) and that the application would not be answered until the end of the session. He and his party knew that, as in 1879-80, nearly a year would pass, because of Democratic legislation, before the adjudicated claims could be settled. Mr. Coffroth and his party assumed that the Union soldier could be deceived by the trick embodied in his resolution, and be made to believe that the Republican officers of the Treasury were in fault and responsible for the delay. Therein Mr. Coffroth and his party were mistaken.

The Democrats had no excuse for this obstructive legislation, for the facts were all in their hands when the act in relation to the reappropriations was repealed, June 14, 1878. Early in May, 1878, while they were maturing their plans to delay the payments of bounties, &c., the estimates for reappropriations were forwarded under the existing law, to Congress. The date of their presentation was May 10, and the sum called for was $420,069 48. So that a month before the obstructive action was taken the needs of the department for the settlement of soldiers' claims were officially known to Congress. Twice since that time has the Secretary sent similar estimates to Congress, though not required by existing law to do so—April 21, 1879, for $265,000, and March 27, 1880, for $265,000—asking for money with which to prevent the delay the responsibility for which Mr. Coffroth and his party, by a cunningly-devised resolution, tried to impose upon him. These estimates were referred to committees, and the Senate committee actually went so far with them as to order them to be printed. They sleep in the committee-rooms, while the party, through its mouth-piece, wants to know why the Secretary has not asked for the money.

SPANISH INSULTS TO OUR FLAG.

A RIGID INVESTIGATION TO BE MADE BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 1.—Secretary Evarts promises to give his time the coming week to a consideration of the insults to which American merchantmen have been recently subjected by the Spaniards in West Indian waters, and another naval officer will be sent to Cuba to examine the last case and report upon it. In the first two cases the Spanish authorities manifested a proper disposition, and promised reparation if it should appear that they had been in the wrong. Owing to a doubt as to the actual distance of the two vessels from shore when the search was made, it is probable that our Government would not have insisted upon reparation in those cases, but in the last case the vessel was fully 15 miles from the Cuban shore, and there seems to be no room for defense. A naval officer says that the Spaniards feel great contempt for our Navy, and do not attempt to conceal this feeling. It is the policy which seems to be indicated by these insults is not changed by an unmistakable rebuke from our Government, he thinks that yet greater insults will be offered, and that every American merchant vessel in West Indian waters will be made to feel that she is allowed to be there only by the condescension of the Spaniards.

RELIGION AT THE SEA-SIDE.

OCEAN GROVE, N. J., Aug. 1.—The religious exercises here to-day were attended by great crowds. Several thousand people were present at the meeting for the promotion of holiness, conducted by Dr. and Mrs. Palmer, in the morning. Mrs. Palmer selected for her customary Bible exposition the epistles to the churches, and her own, as well as the views of others, on Christian life, its obligations and privileges, were incisive and edifying. The Sunday-school meetings were even more largely attended than on last Sunday. A special children's surf-meeting was held on the beach at 6 P. M., at which Bishop Bowman, the Rev. Dr. Stokes, and other eminent clergymen delivered discourses. Over 15,000 people participated in the responsive services. In the Tabernacle, at 7:45 P. M., the Rev. J. Y. Dobbins, of Covington, Ky., delivered the sermon. The meetings were the largest ever held here.

GORED BY A VICIOUS BULL.

SUSQUEHANNA, Penn., July 31.—Frank Niemann, a hammerman in the New-York, Lake Erie and Western Railway shop, at this place, met with an accident a few days ago, which, it is thought, will result fatally. Mr. Niemann owns and lives on a small farm just across the Susquehanna River. A few evenings ago, after leaving his work in the shops he started for home. While passing through a field he saw a vicious bull belonging to him in his oat-field. He endeavored to drive the animal out, but instead of going the bull turned about and attacked Niemann, throwing him against a board fence. One of the animal's horns pierced the unfortunate man's body, penetrating one lung, and otherwise injuring him so badly that no hopes of his recovery are entertained. This is the third time that Mr. Niemann has been attacked by the same brute.

A TOUR OF INSPECTION.

QUEBEC, Aug. 1.—The Government steamer Druid left this morning with the Governor-General, Lord Dufferin, and suite on board. She is bound for the Gulf, and will visit the fishing-ports and signal stations on the coast of the Lower Province.

THE CONTEST IN ILLINOIS

LARGE REPUBLICAN GAINS ASSURED.

TRUMBULL A DEAD WEIGHT ON THE DEMOCRATIC TICKET—REPUBLICAN PROSPECTS IN THE CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS.

CHICAGO, July 31.—Some Democratic newspapers have taken to classing Illinois in the list of doubtful States, though why it is difficult to ascertain. Hayes had a clear majority of 19,631 over Tilden in 1876, and in that year there was a wholesale defection of the German vote from the Republicans, besides which many of the business men of the cities blamed the hard times on the party, and though still Republicans they wanted to see the effects of a change, and voted for Tilden. As a proof of this fact, the result of the election in Cook County, in which Chicago is situated, may be cited. Tilden got in the county 2,700 majority. In every county election since then the Republican candidates have had majorities varying from 5,000 to 10,000. The Germans who voted for Tilden in 1876, have, in nearly every instance, returned to the Republican ranks; the era of prosperity has completely reconciled the dissatisfied Republicans, and the majority of 36,000 which Gen. Smith had over Cronkhite for State Treasurer in 1878 more truly indicates the Republican strength than did Hayes's majority over Tilden. The party this year is thoroughly united. The Grant men, who are among the most active workers in the party, are enthusiastic in their support of the Republican nominees, and the anti-Grant people, fully appreciating this, are disposed to let bygones be bygones, and to treat their late opponents generously in reference to the local offices. Gov. Cullom, who has made an excellent record as Governor, is very popular with a large section of the Democratic Party—the Irish. He consented to preside at the Parnell meeting here in Chicago, after the Democratic Mayor, Carter Harrison, had refused, and there is a large section of the Irish Democrats who, in voting for Shelby M. Cullom, will vote for Garfield; they like to vote their ticket as they take their whisky—straight. Add to this the fact that Lyman Trumbull, the Democratic nominee for Governor, is very unpopular with the masses, (they regard him as a cold-blooded, selfish and egotistic old man, devoid of all sympathy with themselves or their aims; the old-line Democrats too cannot forget that it was he, while a Republican Senator, that drew up the most stringent of the Constitutional amendments, was fiercest in his opposition to reconstruction measures, and that he did not join the Democratic Party until he was relegated to private life by the Republicans,) and it is hard to see how the Democratic editors can regard Trumbull as a strong candidate, or how they can hope that he will pull the national ticket with him to victory in this State in November. The fact is that Trumbull is a dead weight on the ticket, and he will run behind his associates at the approaching election. Last November one of his associates, a candidate for Clerk of the Superior Court of Cook County, and though he himself is an estimable young man, he was the lowest man on the defeated Democratic ticket. His father worked hard to secure his election, which may in some measure account for his overwhelming defeat.

The Republicans, exhausted after the labors of the Chicago Convention, have not done much in the way of organization yet, but they will soon wheel into line, and, notwithstanding the active canvass which the Democrats are making, the State will give Garfield and the State ticket a majority close to, if not exceeding, 30,000 this Fall. More attention is being paid just now to the Congressional nominations than to the State or national ticket. Both parties have put forward their men in many of the districts already, and each party claims that it will make gains in the Congressional representation. A brief review of the state of affairs in the districts may not be amiss.

Chicago, which, with the outside towns of Cook County and Lake and Dupage Counties, form the First, Second, and Third Districts, is represented now by three Republican Congressmen, Messrs. Aldrich, Davis, and Barker. Neither of the gentlemen named have given full satisfaction. Chicagoans think they should be represented by abler men, men of more than local repute, and it is now almost certain that Messrs. Aldrich and Barker, at least, will be retired this Fall. Davis, who is the best man of the three, and is personally popular, may have to go too. For Aldrich's seat the Hon. Emery A. Storrs, a lawyer of national reputation, who was Logan's right bower in the late State Convention, and who will be remembered as Babcock's attorney at St. Louis, is likely to receive the Republican nomination, although Kirk Hawes, who conducted the anti-Grant case in the State Convention, will make a stubborn fight for it. The Democrats have not yet shown any decided preference, but their nomination may go to the Hon. Thomas Hoyne, an able lawyer and an honest man. However, if Hoxie, a cattle-dealer, who was defeated by Aldrich four years ago, only puts up enough cash, the gamblers who control the organization of the Democratic County Committee will secure him the empty honor of another nomination. Hoyne is the strongest man the Democrats have in the district, but as he is a decent man they will scarcely put him up. It looks now as if Emery Storrs could with propriety write M. C. after his name next November. It is not improbable that Herman Raster, editor of the Illinois Staats-Zeitung, will receive the Republican nomination for the Second District. He would have a sure thing in the election, but if Davis is nominated, and the Democrats put up Gen. Stiles, as they talk of doing, the contest will be exceedingly doubtful. In the Third District there are a host of candidates at present, but whatever man the Republicans nominate will, in all human probability, be elected, as the district is very strongly Republican. The Democrats talk of putting up Parry H. Smith, Jr., the son of Tilden's Western manager. The elder Smith is rich, and the thug element, which is so large a factor in the Democratic Party of the urban districts, would like to have some of his money to spend.

The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth are overwhelmingly Republican, and the present Representatives will, in all probability, be renominated, and, in that case, of course re-elected. So far there is no opposition to Col. Hawk, of the Fifth District, and Congressman Sherwin, of the Fourth, will only have to contend against Gen. Hurlbut, and will undoubtedly win. Congressman Henderson, of the Sixth District, has been renominated, and will be elected by about 6,000 majority.

The Seventh District is now represented by Philip C. Hayes, of the Morris Herald. He will have to contend against Mr. Cullen, editor of a paper at Ottawa, in La Salle County. The contest will be close, but whoever wins can count on an election. Washington Armstrong, of La Salle, will be the Democratic leader of the forlorn hope.

The Eighth District is now represented by Greenbury L. Fort, but he is not a candidate for renomination. Whoever the Republican nominee shall be he will be elected, as the district is Republican by about 4,000.

The Republican nominee in the Ninth (Peoria) District, John H. Lewis, is not satisfactory to the party, and if differences are not healed between now and November, and if the Democrats put forward a good candidate, the Republicans will lose the district, which is close, and which is now represented by Mr. Boyd, a Republican.

The Tenth District is also quite close, but it is probable that Mr. Marsh, the present Representative, will more than hold his own against Col. Halloway, the Democratic nominee.

The Eleventh District is strongly Democratic, and Gen. Singleton, of Quincy, can be Democratic nominee if he chooses. William M. Ewing, generally known as "Bill" Springer, is popular with the young Democracy of the district, and notwithstanding the efforts of ex-Congressman "Jim" Robinson and Gen. Wallace to win the party contest him on account of his Sullivan (Ind.) speech, in which he spoke so highly of Gen. Garfield, the district is conceded to him. The Hon. Isaac L. Morrison, who was nominated by the Republicans of the district, has declined the nomination, and the party is at sea at present.

Congressman Stevenson, who now represents the Thirteenth District, was elected by a combination of Greenbackers and Democrats in 1878. There has been a break in the Greenback-Democratic alliance since then, and all efforts to patch up have so far been fruitless, and, notwithstanding Stevenson's personal popularity, he will be very likely succeeded by D. S. Smith, a German-American banker of the district, who has been nominated by the Republicans.

The Democrats have made repeated assaults on the seat of Congressman Cannon, the ablest member of the Republican delegation from Illinois, but so far without success. He defeated the strongest Democrat of the district, Gen. John C. Black, a war-scarred Union soldier, four years ago, and will have no difficulty in beating the present Democratic nominee, Cyrus Busse, a farmer of Champaign.

A. P. Forsythe, a Greenbacker, who was elected by the aid of the Republicans, now represents the Fifteenth District. He slipped in through dissensions among the Democrats. There are two Democrats now in the field, ex-Congressman Eden and Judge Flier, and as both intend to stick, there is a strong probability that a Republican can be elected.

Sparks, the present Democratic Representative of the Sixteenth District, has been renominated, and will be his own successor.

In the Seventeenth, "Bill" Morrison will have to bestir himself in order to retain his seat. Col. Hay, the Republican nominee, is a very strong candidate, and is very popular with the German voters of the district. He stands a good chance of being elected.

The Republicans and Democrats of the Eighteenth District have already made their nominations. The former have renominated Congressman Thomas, and the latter have nominated William Hellman, a rock-rooted, eternal-billed Bourbon. The contest will be exceedingly close, with the chances in favor of Capt. Thomas, who has made an excellent record as Congressman.

The Nineteenth District, being in Egypt and near Kentucky, is hopelessly Democratic. Townshend, the present Congressman, will be re-elected.

To sum up, then, there are nine certainly Republican Districts—the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth—and four Democratic Districts—the Eleventh, Twelfth, Sixteenth, and Nineteenth. Of the doubtful districts, the Republicans will in all probability carry the Second, Thirteenth, Tenth, and Eighteenth, and the Democrats the Ninth and Seventeenth. This would give 13 Republicans to 8 Democrats, a gain of one. It will be seen that though the Democrats may claim Illinois as a doubtful State, there is little doubt that it will show large gains over four years ago for the Republican Congressional, State, and national tickets.

A KUKLUX OUTRAGE IN VERMONT.

BRUTAL TREATMENT OF A STANCH REPUBLICAN BY BOURBON RUFFIANS.

BURLINGTON, Vt., July 31.—Mr. William J. Farr, of East Middlebury, accompanied by his cousin, Milo K. Day, Postmaster at that place, arrived in this city to-day, their object being to procure medical and surgical treatment for Mr. Farr, who was most inhumanly treated by some members of the East Middlebury Hancock and English Club on Thursday night. It would seem that, not satisfied with bull-dozing the blacks at the South, the Democrats are now beginning the same practices in the very few localities in this State where they happen to be in a majority.

About two years ago Mr. Farr went from Binghamton, N. Y., to East Middlebury, and purchased the Glen House, which he fitted up for the accommodation of Summer boarders. Mr. Farr is a sincere and earnest Republican, a fact which did not please the Democrats of East Middlebury, which is the only place in Addison County where they have a majority. Since he has lived there Mr. Farr has been outspoken in his sentiments, and in consequence has been subjected to various petty annoyances, but nothing of a serious nature occurred until Thursday night last. After the Cincinnati Convention, the Democrats of East Middlebury organized a Hancock club, and procured a large flag. Then they invited several Republicans to join their club, Mr. Farr among the number. Instead of doing so, Mr. Farr procured a flag of his own, had the names of Garfield and Arthur painted on it, and raised it on his hotel. This displeased the Democrats so much that a note was sent to Mr. Farr on Wednesday, in these words, but without any names signed to it: "If you don't take that flag down mighty soon you will be sorry." Mr. Farr did not pay any attention to this, but left his flag flying all day Wednesday and Thursday.

At about 12 o'clock Thursday night, after he had retired to rest, the bell at the front door was rung loudly, and, not suspecting anything wrong, Mr. Farr got up, partially dressed, and went to see what was wanted. He opened the door, and was immediately seized by three masked ruffians. A hand was clapped over his mouth and he was dragged into the road, where the three desperadoes were met by twenty-five or thirty more, similarly disguised. Across the road is a barber's shop, and into it they went. Mr. Farr was asked if he would take down the Republican flag, and he bravely said he would not. The fellows, who were either drunk or pretending to be, then took razors and shaved off all of Mr. Farr's beard and hair, inflicting four scalp wounds in the course of the operation. The owner of the shop must have known all about it, for the shop was not locked and the scoundrels seemed to find everything they wanted very easily. Mr. Farr was then taken to the bank of Otter Creek, which runs close by, and again was asked if he would haul down the Republican flag. Again he firmly answered no. A rope was then tied to his feet, a bandage put over his mouth, and he was thrown into the river three times in succession and dragged out by the rope, more dead than alive. He was then tied up to a tree with his wet clothes on and left. He was found in the morning senseless, and taken home.

Mr. Farr will be cared for at the Fletcher Hospital, in this city. His injuries are severe, but probably not dangerous. However, he will always be disfigured, and will be a standing monument of the brutal Kuklux-ism of Vermont Democratic Copperheads. The Sheriff and State's Attorney of Addison County are now at work to discover the perpetrators of the outrage, and if their identity can be established, they will feel the severity of Vermont justice.

A CLERGYMAN ARRESTED.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 1.—The Rev. T. B. Miller, Dean of the University of Medicine and Surgery, was arrested to-night while going to church, upon the charge of forgery, preferred by John Norris, city editor of the Record, who, in February last, bought for $25 a certificate authorizing him to practice medicine. The alleged forgery consists in antedating a series of lecture tickets at the time of granting the certificate, and in writing the names of the Professors on them. Mr. Miller will have a hearing in the morning.

AN OLD MAN HANGS HIMSELF.

HANCOCK, N. Y., July 31.—John Carlton, an old and well-known citizen of New-Berlin, Broome County, N. Y., 71 years of age, committed suicide a day or two ago by hanging in a barn belonging to George Warner, for whom Carlton worked. It is said that Carlton was in reduced circumstances, which is thought to have been the cause of his suicide.

QUICK RAILROAD WORK.

POINT PLEASANT, N. J., Aug. 1.—An additional rail was laid on the Long Branch Division of the Central Railroad of New-Jersey to-day from Long Branch to Shark River, with ballast. The distance is 11 miles, and it was thought to accomplish the work. On and after to-morrow all trains will run through to Point Pleasant.

AFFAIRS IN FOREIGN LANDS

AYOOB KHAN'S VICTORY OVER THE BRITISH.

THE AFGHAN CHIEF FAILS TO FOLLOW UP HIS SUCCESS—HIS HEAVY LOSSES—GEN. BURROWS'S FORCE IN KANDAHAR.

SIMLA, Aug. 1.—Reports from Quettah indicate that Ayoob Khan did not follow up his victory by pursuing the British. It is stated that Gen. Burrows succeeded in bringing a large body of his troops into Kandahar.

LONDON, Aug. 2.—A Bombay correspondent telegraphs: "The battle between Gen. Burrows's force and the Afghans is said to have been well contested. The British cavalry and artillery were badly cut up at the commencement of the fight, but the infantry inflicted such heavy loss on Ayoob Khan that he has not ventured to advance upon Kandahar."

The Viceroy of India telegraphed on Sunday that Ayoob Khan did not follow up the British retreat. Gen. Burrows's force has arrived at Kandahar. When the messenger left, Ayoob Khan was encamped where the action was fought. This seems to confirm the news that Ayoob Khan had suffered heavily. This news was brought by natives to Quettah. The Viceroy's telegram says: "Our whole army is not in the citadel, at Candahar, but the word 'not' is probably a telegraphic error for 'now.'"

A Kabul correspondent announces that Mr. Griffin, the British representative, has met Abdurrahman at a private interview. His demeanor was excellent. There were but few troops with him.

Another Kabul correspondent says the prospect of a favorable settlement with Abdurrahman and the speedy withdrawal of the army from Kabul are, no doubt, seriously menaced by the disaster at Kandahar, but Gen. Stewart's force is adequate for any emergency, and need fear no combination which can be brought against it. Mr. Griffin has twice held an interview with Abdurrahman. Gen. Stewart will meet Abdurrahman in public durbar at Gen. Gough's camp, at Kalabadt, on Monday.

A later Kabul dispatch says: "Mr. Griffin held an interview with Abdurrahman on Saturday, at Zimma, which lasted three hours. The British escort consisted of three squadrons of cavalry, and the Ameer's escort of 200 infantry. Abdurrahman evidently desires our friendship, but feels insecure until more successful in gaining over the country to his side. His Turkestan troops are the most suspicious, and he finds it necessary to humor them.

A Calcutta correspondent says everything seems to point to Gen. Burrows having been out-generaled, and the battle of Phushki Nakhud will probably be hereafter cited as one more instance of the story, old as British history itself, of a gallant army being ruined by the infatuation and incompetence of its leaders and the treachery of its allies, as there can be little doubt that the Walli cavalry went over to the enemy.

A Bombay dispatch reports that the Khelati-Ghilzai garrison is in a very precarious state. The tribes are gathered in the vicinity, and much anxiety is felt for the garrison unless Gen. Phayre relieves it, which would delay his march to Kandahar.

PHASES OF EASTERN AFFAIRS.

SOUTH CAROLINA INJUSTICE.

A JUDGMENT AGAINST D. T. CORBIN THAT WOULD NOT BE RENDERED EXCEPT IN A DEMOCRATIC COURT.

CHARLESTON, S. C., Aug. 1.—The verdict in the case of the State of South Carolina against D. T. Corbin, rendered in the Richland County Court, is a fair sample of the kind of justice Republicans receive in the South Carolina courts. It appears that Corbin, under a settlement with Controller-General Dunn in 1875, retained, out of money due the State, $23,728 44 for professional services rendered the State by Corbin & Stone. When the Democratic Party came into power the matter was reopened, and the new Controller-General instituted proceedings for the recovery of this money, on the ground that his predecessor had no legal right to make such a settlement. The case came up in Columbia at the present term of court, and occupied three days. Corbin was represented by Ackerman & Earle, who produced a counter-claim of $30,000 lent the State in 1877, and $10,000 for professional services rendered by Corbin in the Savannah Railroad suit. In the first instance, Judge Hudson sustained the present Controller's position, and in the second, he ruled that if the counter-claim had been brought against private citizens it would hold good, but the State could not be sued for her debts, and Corbin's only resource to obtain the money due him would be through petition to the Legislature. Corbin's defense, which was based upon two similar cases in Bay's Reports, was set aside, and the jury, under the Judge's direction, rendered a verdict for the payment of $30,- 622 06, principal and interest, against the defendant. It is the same old story. South Carolina, under the Bourbon rule, unscrupulously defrauds her legal creditors and repudiates her honest debts, while she relentlessly exacts the last cent from her debtors, many of whom, like Corbin, have large sums to their credit on the Treasurer's books. Mr. Corbin, who arrived in the city this morning, said he considered himself fortunate because the jury did not add, "and shall be hanged until he is dead" to the verdict. With the advice and concurrence of some of the best legal talent in the State, the case will be carried before the Supreme Court on appeal.

An incident has recently occurred which will serve as a warning to capitalists who seek opportunities to invest money. Several gentlemen residing north of Mason and Dixon's line have undertaken to supply a want long felt in this city, to wit: a permanent supply of pure water. They have incurred a very heavy expense, have laid about 12 miles of pipes, and are now in a position to furnish the greater portion of the city with artesian well water. In compliance with their contract, they have also established a number of fire-plugs throughout the city. All this was accomplished without the least aid from the City Government; yet when these gentlemen demanded the first installment due them from the city under the contract, the Aldermen not only refused payment, but they seriously discussed the confiscation of the entire water-works on some simple technical deficiencies. The "skull and crossbones" would be a more fit emblem on the South Carolina banner than the palmetto tree, under the present régime.

A CAPTIVE BALLOON ESCAPES.

TWO COUNTRY-PEOPLE INVOLUNTARILY CARRIED OFF BY A LARGE AIR-SHIP.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 1.—A dispatch from Youngstown, Ohio, says that an imprisoned balloon that had been used there for short excursions by a man named Henry, broke loose from the guy-ropes at 5:30 o'clock last evening and started skyward. In the small basket attached to the gigantic air-ship were two persons, a man and a woman, who had come into town from the neighboring country. There was a large crowd of people standing around the guy-ropes at the time they broke, and a cry of terror rose from them all. The balloon darted upward with marvelous rapidity. At first the occupants of the frail car did not realize that the balloon had broken away from its moorings, but when they glanced down and saw the earth rapidly receding, they gesticulated piteously to the crowd as if imploring assistance. When the balloon had reached a high altitude it drifted in a north-easterly direction. It was followed by many people with telescopes, and finally disappeared in that direction. The man and woman in the balloon came into town yesterday from the country, and thought they would hazard a balloon ride. Word has been sent to all towns lying to the north-east of the place, and a lookout will be kept for the balloon in case it should drift near the earth. There was a great deal of gas in it, and it is feared that it will drift up to the lake. The couple who took this involuntary ride know nothing about the management of balloons. At last accounts no word had been received at Youngstown as to their fate. It is hoped they have reached ground in safety further north.

A RAILROAD TO LEADVILLE.

DENVER, Col., Aug. 1.—The joint track of the Denver and South Park and Denver and Rio Grande Railroads was completed into Leadville yesterday, and both companies began running regular through trains to-day. Their track is also completed and opened for business to Hortense, 12 miles from Buena Vista, on the Gunnison extension.

PLAYING POLO ON SKATES.

NEWPORT, Aug. 1.—The polo games on skates at the skating rink last evening were witnessed by a large crowd. Five games were played, four of which were won by Capt. A. H. Old's team, and one by Capt. H. H. Crosby's team. Capt. Old was presented at the close of the contest with a handsome floral gift.

A FATAL SURGICAL OPERATION.

HEAVY GRAIN SHIPMENTS.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Aug. 1.—Forty-five freight trains, comprising 1,500 cars, almost all of which were filled with grain, passed south on the Hudson River Railroad yesterday. It was the heaviest day's shipment since the road was built.

CONGRESSIONAL NOMINATION.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 1.—W. K. Boone, of Allen County, was unanimously nominated Republican candidate annoyance. If the latter be their motive, they realize only too soon how easy it was to be mistaken. The show of weakness displayed in this purchase of one article is but an instance, meant by the native octopus to fasten another fiber upon his victim. He is like the tiger, in whom the taste of blood stimulates a craving for more. He has a thousand contrivances for extorting money, and he drags the unhappy visitor from shop to photograph gallery, from photograph gallery to camera obscura, and so on until the terrified stranger, dimly realizing that he is making an exposure not of himself, rushes violently away, his arms full of costly rubbish, and he is distraught in the instance a final invitation rings in his ears to "take a trip to Table Rock and under the falls—the grandest thing about the Cataract—only $1." And as he strolls along rejoicing in his escape, he will suffer a further shock to notice a sign over the Canadian Park gateway was "free last year, of "admission 20 cents."

Supposing he has maintained his moral courage and refused to be intrapped, despite the taunts which his companions freely lavish on such as he, he now goes descend the ferry road. For 25 cents more, making $1 in all, he will be rowed across the stream, obtaining a unique view of the two falls from beneath, and will be landed at the bottom of the inclined railway leading up to Prospect Park. Without further fee he is entitled to a ride upward on the railway, and the full enjoyment of the park, and as there is no limit to the length of time he may remain there, he can, if he chooses, wait until after dark and witness the play of the electric and colored lights upon the cataracts and rapids, returning to his hotel in ample time for a late supper. He will thus have seen at the minimum of cost everything that is necessary to see, particularly if he has come by way of the railroad along the southern river bank from the east, whence an excellent view of the "whirlpool" is had. There is nothing else worth expending money for unless one cares to go under the falls, which costs $1 more. All the other "places of interest," with fee attachments, are arrant humbugs. In a carriage—even from the hotels—the amount of money that may be thrown away with no better result is limited only by the natural avidity of the visitor. Take the bridge, for instance. The toll for a hack and a single passenger both ways is $1.50, in addition to carriage hire, and similar extortions are practiced everywhere. A still cheaper method of seeing the falls and the electric illumination at night satisfactorily is to take lodgings on the Canada side. The Clifton House in particular appears to be specially free from the objectionable features of the majority of the hotels on this side. It has the singular appendage of a free "bus," and for that alone merits special recognition.

If a stranger attempts to walk through the streets, he is beset by irresponsible hack-drivers, who stop their vehicles in front of him on the crossings and block his way on the sidewalks, jostling and pushing his passage, and following him up for blocks. It is of no use to refuse. They have worn out persons before by persistence, and hope to do so again. If the visitor continue obdurate, efforts are made to him which savor of cheapness; but should he foolishly accept, he will bitterly regret it. The Niagara residents are cunning in the use of phrases from which they can extract meanings of which their victims never dreamed, and the end is the alternative of an undignified street row, or the loss and expense of several additional days' time in attendance upon local courts, whose magistrates owe their positions to, and are the creatures of, the shop-keepers, hackmen, and other extortioners. When about to go home, the unfortunate stranger will discover that his hotel bill is considerably larger than he had calculated, using the printed terms tacked upon the door of his room as a basis. Among these items at the International was a paragraph to the effect that guests would be charged 50 cents for omnibus and express. It did not explain that this meant only one cent. Almost every blockman I paid $1 for this item all the same. When you reach the depot and are about to board the cars, you are accosted by a person with the name of the hotel in brass letters affixed to his hat, who demands additional pay for carrying your luggage to the station, saying, with consummate impudence, that he receives nothing from the hotel for the service. I have seen several gentlemen accede to the swindle, in every case after an indignant remonstrance, which the baggage fiend met with a most imperturbable smile, as though he were well used to it.

There appears to be only one remedy for this lamentable state of affairs, and that lies in the consummation of the scheme for the purchase of the land on both sides of the falls by the State of New-York on the one hand and the Dominion Government on the other, and the adoption of a specific set of regulations whereby the hackmen and shopkeepers may be kept within bounds. I find that there exists here a violent opposition to the plan—not among the owners of the property to be taken, whom, I suppose, it is intended to satisfy with the compensation suggested by the Commissioners—but among the residents of the village, who argue that if so much valuable real estate be withdrawn from their assessment lists it will increase the burden of taxation upon the remainder to an unjust degree. This, I am told, is the only basis of opposition. These people seem to lose sight entirely of the immense advantages that will flow to them from the increased patronage of the outer world and the enhanced value that will be given to their holdings in consequence; but their ideas cannot be expected to be in advance of their business, which consists almost altogether in the disposal of useless gimcracks. Their policy has ever been to make the most of the present regardless of the detriment their conduct may do to them in the future. Surely they have not cause to be satisfied with their present manifest lack of prosperity; and in any event the interests of many millions should not be sacrificed to gratify the unreasonable whims of a paltry 1,200. I hope the legislature will be present during the discussion of the measure in behalf of the village. It is to be hoped, however, that should the scheme eventually go through, the toll-gates now maintained by the Canadian Government on its land across the river will be abolished, and that suitable railings and iamns will be erected along the edge of the precipitous bluff on that side. It is now exceedingly dangerous after nightfall, and several accidents have already occurred there this season. On Sunday, May 30, William and Richard Heffernan, New-Yorkers, who had been spending a few weeks with their sister at the Prospect House, started on a stroll to the Clifton House and back after supper. Next morning Richard was found lying on the path bleeding from severe wounds on the head and nearly exhausted. A search discovered the dead body of William lying on the roadway leading to the ferry. They had walked off the edge in the darkness, and Richard had managed to crawl back to where he was found. Last week a child from an excursion party dropped over near the same place, and fell, fortunately for her, on a ledge of rock, and escaped without serious injury. Nobody has had the misfortune to go over the falls this season, but there have been an unusual number of suicides, all of which have already been reported from time to time by telegraph. Young Edwin Short, who came hither on the 19th inst. for the purpose of casting himself over the cataract, but whose courage failing when he reached Goat Island and saw the awful rush of water at close quarters, shot himself in the head, still lies here hovering between life and death. The chances are very much against his recovery. Additional fences or barriers would not be amiss at many points on this side also, if only for the purpose of restraining the many astounding fools who continually persist in washing their hands in, and dipping water from the edge of the falls. It is no place at present for such persons, for intoxicated people, or for children, unless firmly pinioned by the hands of parents or guardians.

The International Hotel has changed hands since the death of its proprietor, Mr. James Fulton, Jr., last Spring. It is now under the management of Messrs. Gluck, Ward & Delano, the first the owner of the Spencer House. It has been thoroughly renovated, decorated and refurnished. The so-called International River Parlor building is no longer an attachment of the hotel, its furniture having been seized under foreclosure of mortgage this Spring. The "parlor" is now unoccupied. The Cataract House has had a new elevator put in, and on the very first night that it was run, John H. Murphy, who had been hand waiter at the hotel for 27 successive years, was instantly killed in it. The Park Place Hotel was sold under foreclosure of mortgage this Spring, and now bears a large placard on its side, asking for a purchaser at private sale. For the rest, there have been few changes to note since last year, save the successful introduction of the electric lights in Prospect Park, lamps in process of erection. The chief of the illumination on the water at night is extraordinarily beautiful. The ridges of the rapids are made to look like burnished silver above the black [illegible] of the roaring torrent. The effect [illegible] and all the other [illegible] the river on the Canadian side and on Goat and Luna Islands in panoramic beauty. Other lights suspended above the trees spread over the grass and foliage a radiance as clear, but softer and less fierce, than that of the sun. The New-York Saengerbund, who are here on an excursion, sang rollicking German songs there last evening, to the delight of a large throng of the village people. These excursions are a feature of the attendance here. They come from everywhere, but they are of little value to the hotels, as, in the majority of instances, they bring their lunch with them, and do not carry longer than a day. One of them arrived late morning, and it was amusing to see its members huddle together in the railroad depot, out of which they refused to budge until all were ready to start. Then, in a solid mass, and with set faces, they advanced upon the mob of waiting hackmen, who hung upon their sides like a long fringe, clamoring for fees and showering abuse upon those who remained obdurate for blocks. Twenty-two members of the New-York Artists' Fund Society spent a few days here in the latter part of June, having traveled to Lockport on a yacht by way of the Erie Canal. They were Edward Bay, Thomas Hicks, G. H. McCord, J. M. Falconer, J. R. Bristol, P. P. Ryder, J. D. Harrow, J. Thompson Bricher, A. F. Bunner, J. F. Cropsey, D. M. Carter, Percival De Luce, A. C. Gilmandi, H. Fueschel, Alfred Jones, R. Matt and Armstrong, S. J. Gay, John Williamson, George H. Zewell, J. C. Nicoll, A. Wordsworth Thompson, and Arthur Parton. They were the guests of W. J. Arzell. Three lads of good family successfully made a pedestrian journey from Westchester, Penn., to the Falls on foot last week, and, after seeing the sights, started on their return the same way. They looked bright and hearty, and reported that they had enjoyed the trip exceedingly. The Fourteenth Ohio National Guard Regiment is expected to encamp for a week at the Falls in August.

There has been a notable absence of Southerners this year, and some of the landlords ascribe to their defection the prevailing dullness. The weather is said to have been to delightful in the South that people did not care to come away. Here it has been unusually hot the greater part of the Summer, but during the past few weeks there has been a grateful change, with daily showers, and now the atmosphere is that of Fall—cool, breezy, and pleasant. Angling in the river above the rapids is reported as unusually good, black bass, perch, rock-bass, pickerel, and lake sheepshead being the varieties most encountered. There has been much complaint this year of illegal fishing by mismanned sporting parties, and the authorities have been stirred up to put a stop to it. The Winter was very mild, and the flight of aquatic birds was unusually large. Two hundred wild ducks were picked up in the river one morning, having been carried over the falls and killed during the night. The statement published in your letter from Alexandria Bay, that a palace car is attached to the through train on the new Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburg route between that place and this, is misleading, and apt to be of injury to persons in delicate health. It is so advertised, but no such car is run. The worst of it is that the company's agents will not tell the truth about it. At the Bay they say they will telegraph to Cape Vincent for you without charge. At the Cape you are told that the car is put on at Watertown. There you are informed that you must wait until you get to Rickland, and so on.

Among the guests at the International Hotel have been James Slater and daughters, Gen. Robert Halsey and Miss Halsey, R. W. King and party, W. M. Jackson and wife, Dr. M. M. Stearns, A. G. NEW PUBLICATIONS

AUGUST MAGAZINES.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

—It has already been announced that an expedition is soon to set out on a tour of exploration among the ruins of the ancient cities of Mexico and Central America. In the August number of the North American Review the editor, Mr. Allen Thorndike Rice, who has taken part in organizing the expedition, gives an account of its plan and aims. "It is dispatched," he states, "under the joint auspices of the Governments of the United States and France. The expense will be jointly defrayed by Mr. Pierre Lorillard, of New-York, the original promoter of the undertaking, and by the French Government. The expedition is under the charge of M. Desiré Charnay. It is thoroughly equipped and comprises an efficient staff. The means are provided not only of photographing bas-reliefs and hieroglyphic inscriptions, but of making careful casts of them by the process of M. Lotin de Laval. Copies of these casts will first be presented to the Smithsonian Institution, at Washington, and to the French Government. The exploring party will visit Mount Alban, Mitla, Palenque, and other great centres of ancient civilization. Its route will lie through Oaxaca, Tehuantepec, and Guatemala, terminating in the Peninsula of Yucatan, where the ground is to a great degree fresh." Mr. Rice's article is one of considerable length, and serves as an introduction to the labors and possible discoveries of the expedition by telling what has already been accomplished in this little-trodden field. In a paper on "The Law of Newspaper Libel," John Proffatt has brought together in a form convenient for reference a large number of decisions in important libel cases. The decisions and principles presented in this article, in fact, make up the body of our law of libel, and it does not require a very laborious examination of the cases cited to reach the conclusion that in this particular field of litigation the virtue and justice of a cause by no means justify a confident expectation of success for either party. Every newspaper libel case brings out afresh a crowd of loose definitions and conflicting decisions, and in the present state of the laws not even the special jury of a higher order of intelligence," which Mr. Proffatt contends should be had in such trials, would often be able to make up their minds with absolute certainty in accordance with the requirements of their oaths without much deliberation and some serious misgivings. Richard H. Dana, who is now in Paris engaged in the preparation of a work on constitutional law, gives us a chip from his workshop in the shape of a paper on the "Nullity of the Emancipation Edict." Believing that it is never right to allow a mistake upon any important political act to go uncorrected, he feels called upon to show that what the emancipation proclamation assumed to do was beyond the power of the President, Congress, or the whole people of the loyal States to have effected. President Lincoln declared that "all persons held as slaves within said designated States are, and from henceforth shall be free." But at that time the designated States were beyond the control of the President, and naval power was needed. The proclamation was not a military order, to take effect in the future, but an edict, to take effect from the time it was given out, to operate proprio vigore. The military and naval powers were not ordered to create and confer liberty on these persons, but to "recognize and maintain" it. Mr. Dana contends that "no emancipation of slaves can be effected under the war power, except upon the condition of successful occupation. The President could no more free the slaves by proclamation than he could decree a victory or proclaim territory to be within our military control which was not so in fact." It is his opinion that Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet advisers were not consulted in regard to the proclamation, and that the adoption of the measure was due in a certain degree to a pressure which was brought upon the President to make such a change in the policy of his Administration that the war should take hold on slavery as well as on the rebellion. In this movement it was evident that Mr. Sumner bore a considerable part. "Fortunately," says Mr. Dana, "the proclamation was never brought to a test. There can be but little doubt that foreign States and our own judiciary would have treated it as ineffectual." Mr. Charles F. Johnson briefly examines our census laws and the organization of the work of 1880, which, he asserts, will serve as a practical test of hand improved methods. Mr. Simon Sterne writes upon an important subject, "The Principles of Taxation." Among the conclusions to which his studies have brought him is one which indicates his dissent from the doctrine that the consumer pays all taxes. In the case of what he calls "incensitive" articles, like tobacco, liquor, and medicines, whose total consumption is practically unaffected by taxation, the producer simply adds the amount of the tax to the price, and the consumers pay it, with no falling off in the demand. In the case of sensitive articles, the addition of the whole tax to the price would result in a falling off in sales. Then, either the producer must submit to a smaller profit, paying the whole or a part of the tax out of his own profit, or the production must be reduced until the demand and supply are even, in the first case the consumers will pay the tax, in the latter case some of the producers must seek other employment. Only in two cases, therefore, does the consumer pay the whole tax: (1.) When the product is of the "incensitive" class, and (2) when through free competition the price of the product taxed is brought down to the lowest possible limit, so that the producers cannot pay any part of the tax, but will betake themselves to other employments, bringing about a diminution in production and an increase in price. It will be seen that, according to this theory, the possessor of a monopoly in the production of a "sensitive" product would have to pay his own tax. To this Mr. Sterne's critics will inevitably reply that as he pays the tax out of profits derived from sales, it is still the consumer who pays. Moritz Busch ladles out a further installment of his dull and heavy gossip about Bismarck. In apparent ignorance of the fact that we have already heard of the man Bismarck, and even know some of the anecdotes that are told about him, he lugs in the old, old story of the cigars at the Diet of the Confederation at Frankfort, which he calls "delightful," though it merely goes to show that the delegates there assembled were a parcel of German boors.

THE INTERNATIONAL REVIEW.

—Mr. W. Fraser Rae's article on "The Census in England," in the August number of the International Review, adds very little to the sum of our knowledge on that subject, gathered from the writings of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and others, and from the English newspapers. Moreover, Mr. Rae—who is an Englishman—does not write the English language with skill and clearness. Were an American writer to contribute an article marred by so many faults of style to an English review, we suppose some of the London "literary" journals would declare that they could not understand him, that being one of their favorite forms of disparagement when speaking of our ignorance of the mother tongue. It is not difficult, however, to get at Mr. Rae's meaning, what there is of it. He tells us how the caucus was engrafted upon the English political system through the efforts of Mr. Chamberlain and others, and then examines some of the reasons why it fails to realize in practice all the expectations which theory founds upon it. Most of these are sufficiently familiar to us in our own political experience. "The serious difficulty" of "getting a truly representative body of constituency delegates" to the caucus, is felt here with quite as much force as in England. The wrongful manipulation of primaries in the interests of particular candidates has grown to be a common practice in England, though the caucus is hardly three years old there. "Bolting" is more common there than here on account of the wide of cleavage in the elements of the Liberal Party, and questions as disestablishment, local option, the anti-vaccination crazes, &c., splitting the party into factions, leading to rival candidacies, and not infrequently to the return of a Tory member for a strongly Liberal constituency, the majority of Liberals, of course, preferring the Tories and failing to the old standard of Conservatism. The sixth volume of Mr. Masson's "Life of Milton" includes Henry Cabot Lodge, of Boston, in his list and calls for a paper with a good title from Mr. Lodge. We maintain that a Cabot, if called to contribute, has a workman equal to any Boston critic, who presumably knows, as we know, will, like usual, disastrous results. It is a question whether he will not be obsequious enough.

Supposing that the figures given are condensed from the record, as we have it, of six months only, and that it does not claim to be complete, we summarize the following figures:

RECORD FOR FIRST SIX MONTHS.

	Number of Roads.	Miles.
Track laid	37	1,790
Roads on which construction is in progress	119	8,000
Projects reported additional to the above	110	10,850
Total	267	20,640

Thus it appears that railway enterprises to the number of 267, and covering a contemplated mileage of over 20,000 miles, have been reported to the Bulletin during six months, as either in process of construction or projected. Certainly these figures are very encouraging to all whose business is in any way connected with railway building or operation, as they show that a vast work is yet to be done.

TALMAGE IN LEADVILLE.

HE VISITS THE GAMBLING-HOUSES AND DANCE-HALLS.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

LEADVILLE, Col., July 20.—The Rev. De Witt Talmage last evening repeated in Leadville his astonishing performance in New-York a year or so ago, making a personal inspection of the slums and by-ways, and privately visiting the dance-houses and gambling-halls, and viewing the life therein presented for the purpose, as Mr. Talmage explains, of qualifying himself to flourish in the faces of his hearers the fire-brand freshly snatched from the hot-bed of iniquity. On their arrival, night before last, Mr. Talmage and his wife were temporarily assigned to a room on the first floor of the Clarendon, from which the clerk yesterday offered to change them for an expedite apartment near the parlor, usually occupied by Gov. Pitkin and like distinguished guests. Mr. Talmage inspected the apartment and said to the porter: "I guess we will take both rooms; we are nervous from the effects of our trip, and I do not care to disturb Mrs. Talmage." So Mrs. Talmage kept the first room while Mr. Talmage took possession of the other. Last evening he breakfasted at the City Hall on "Big Blunders" at 10:30 o'clock, when dismissed his audience, and he was rapidly driven to the hotel. Half an hour was spent in preparing for the work before him, and Mr. Talmage was ready to set out. With a solitary companion to guide him, the preacher quit the hotel about 11 o'clock, and entered Harrison-avenue, at which hour it was always filled with a busy crowd of people engaged on various errands, thronging the sidewalks and bowing each other in a ceaseless tide. They crossed the street, and stopped in front of the Board of Trade saloon without entering. Mr. Talmage being informed by his guide that a man had been shot over a gambling-table there on Monday night. The parson contented himself with a curious glance down the polished bar-room floor and into the gambling-hall beyond the open curtains. He and his companion then crossed the street and entered Wyman's gambling saloon, where Mr. Talmage stopped long enough to obtain a full view of the little crowd of players seated about half a dozen green tables and watching with breathless interest the progress of the games. From here Mr. Talmage proceeded to what is known as "Texas," another gambling saloon, where music and a good lunch relieved the monotony of faro, and where the crowd present was equally large about the different tables. Here Mr. Talmage was recognized by one of the gamesters, and in the instant was the cynosure of the entire room. He was hastily retreated, reaching the street, thence continuing his visit to three other gambling-rooms on Harrison-avenue, where he was thoroughly initiated into the secrets of poker, keno, and roulette. The preacher and his companion then turned down Third-street and proceeded to visit the dance-houses. The first of these places at which Mr. Talmage stopped and entered was the Odeon. His companion led half way down the hall. Mr. Talmage stood for a few minutes in the ball-room, watching the girls as they treaded the maze of the dance in wild abandon. The floor manager, not recognizing him, approached Mr. Talmage and asked him to lead a set, but the invitation was politely declined, and, as soon as he could pay his guide once more within reach of his voice, they stepped out and continued down the street until the Red Light Dance Hall was reached, where they entered, the preacher timidly inquiring several times of his guide if all the men carried arms. Thus the rounds were completed from Harrison-avenue to Pine, and Mr. Talmage had viewed all that was to be seen in this delicate region. In the last dance-house visited Talmage had been recognized by one of the girls, and he was glad when he found himself once more beyond the bold inspection of the frequenters of the place, to whom his presence became known almost as soon as he had set foot inside the door. He wished to have a glance at the female gamblers before retiring, but on consulting his watch found it was past 12 o'clock, and determined to defer his visit until to-night. He returned to the hotel and occupied his room till morning.

A QUEER WAY TO FIND CONCEALED WEAPONS.

From the San Francisco Chronicle, July 22.

In accordance with orders from Chief of Police Crowley, a detachment of some 100 officers of Capt. Douglass's watch reported at the Central Station at 11:30 o'clock last night. Fifty of them, commanded by Capt. Douglass, proceeded to the Chinese theatre, on Jackson-street, and the other half, headed by Sergt. Harmon, went to the second theatre, on Washington-street. As soon as the officers entered the theatres all means of exit were guarded, and officers rushed forward to hold the stage. Both theatres were crowded to the utmost, the throng being so dense that the actors were inconvenienced, as many of the audience were standing upon the stage. The performance ceased abruptly and the audience being driven out, each one as he was about to leave was searched to obtain such weapons as might be concealed on the person. In all there were obtained from the two theatres eight pistols, two disk knives, a few silver spoons and a few knives and forks, which articles had been thrown either under the benches or into the street. At the Jackson-street theatre some few in their consternation and hurry to leave left behind hats and caps. Not a weapon was found on any person. Some 70 heathen were taken to the prison and there searched. Nothing being found on them they were allowed to go. One Chinaman who was brought to the prison gave the name of George Washington, said that he was a Christian, and had been naturalized in 1872. In New-York, a Chinaman individual, who gave the name of Charles Sanders, was arrested for attempting to rescue a prisoner in the custody of Officer Gould, but the charge was afterward changed to simple drunkenness. Chief of Police Crowley states that these raids will be continued in order to disarm the members of the Chinese, as far as possible, of the murderous weapons which they carry. The paucity of armed men at the two theatres was a circumstance that was noted by every one.

AN ELMIRA MAN'S DREAM.

From the Elmira Gazette, July 31.

Nine years ago William Carter, of Canisteo, dreamed that he was out in company with a party hunting for game, and that he struck into a little ravine where some pheasants flew up. In his hurry to get a shot at them he became entangled in the bushes and thorns, which scratched his face and hands terribly. After getting through the bushes he came to a white stone which was full of marks, and after a time he discovered in his dream a 50-barrel flowing oil-well. The second night the dream was repeated, and on the third night he dreamed the same thing; yet, not being a believer in dreams he said nothing about it except to a few of his friends. The oil theory was not booming in those days as it is now. He began to after the strange dream, he was out hunting with a party on Bennett's Creek, four or five miles south of Canisteo. All at once he came upon some pheasants in some bushes, and, in his hurry, scratched his hands and face precisely as in his dream. The second night after getting through the bushes, he saw the white stone he had seen three years before in his dream. Then and there he recalled the vision of three years before, and told his friends that there was oil there, and that he would some time have a well bored on the spot. He was laughed at for his pains, but he persisted in his belief, and was ahead some time, but could not forget the dream. He afterward returned, and has been engaged with his father and brothers in the foundry and machine shop in Canisteo. Two years ago, when the men from Bradford came to drill for oil, they came to Carter's farm, and within 80 rods of the spot described by the dream, but, through some flaw in the lease, they gave up the site and came near the village and drilled the well our readers have heard so much about. On Monday last several shareholders with officers of the company, went to Bennett's Creek to locate the new well, and nearly all gave in a favorable opinion of a location which proves to be within 80 rods of the white stone. Mr. Carter was not in the party, but he is the man who has the contract for drilling the well.

TURKISH FINANCES.

From the London World.

Turkish bonds are so low now that it is said speculators cannot go wrong in buying for the rise, in the hope that the powers, in readjusting Turkish affairs, must bring about some arrangement. Except on the chance that when things are at their worst they must begin to mend, it is hard to see reason for the calculation. In vain have been all attempts to incline the Porte to honest dealing, and equally vain have proved the binding terms of the treaty of Berlin. Now that Germany—hitherto for her own reasons—has tackled Turkish affairs, there may be some small chance of a little result being attained through the same instrumentality as was witnessed in Egypt. But Turkish finance and honesty have been a byword for years, and though the country of the Pharaohs is ruined in regard to its credit, it spoiled the jaded for the last time, there is too much muddle yet in the land of the Nile to make investment safe, particularly. Nevertheless, we do mean let the Turkish bondholders weary for a little at government and give the poor Sultan a Machiavelli in search of their pound of flesh. We have before us a memorial to Earl Granville of the Turkish Bankers, a pen sketch of Turkish finance which makes out a very hard case. On the face of their bonds, they have a hypothecation of the taxes, and include in addition to the direct guarantee of the Ottoman Government. Arrears have accumulated in the provinces which are now included in the provinces of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia. But these hypothecated taxes, or the tributes of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia in their place, are mostly collected and held to my own use by the Ottoman Government. The claim of the Turkish Treasury bond holders is complete in international law and honor, but how is it to be enforced until the gradual falling to pieces of the Turkish Empire in Europe?

CO-OPERATION IN TORONTO.

AN ASSOCIATION THAT HAS PROSPERED FOR TWO YEARS.

From the Toronto (Canada) Globe, July 31.

It is not perhaps generally known that a co-operative association, conducted on the same principles as govern the old established co-operative societies in the mother country, has been in existence in Toronto for the past two years, and is now one of the established institutions of the country. On Aug. 10, 1877, the first preliminary meeting was held, and on the 1st of April in the following year the association opened its doors to its members and customers, then comparatively few in number. Since that time the business of the store has increased very considerably, and is increasing still. The chief aim of the association is to furnish the members with the necessaries of life without paying extravagant prices. The association buys and sells for cash only, and thereby the members escape paying other people's bad debts, which the man who pays 100 cents on the dollar nearly always has to do under the ordinary system of trade. Under the co-operative system, the profits, after paying interest on capital, which is owned by the members, and the working expenses, are divided among the purchasers in the shape of dividends. The interest paid to members on share capital is 6 per cent, per annum on paid-up shares. It will be seen, therefore, that while the association saves its members about 15 per cent. on their purchases, it also provides them with a sure and profitable investment for their savings—an investment be it observed, over which they have entire control. The extent of purchases made from quarter to quarter is arrived at by the issue of checks. At present the association has only paper checks, but in course of time they will adopt the old country tin and brass tokens, samples of which the management have now in their possession. The entrance fee to membership is 20 cents, every member to have one or more shares of $25 each, to be paid at the time of entry, the rate of 20 per cent. per quarter, as best suits the member's convenience. The business of the association is managed by a committee elected by the members, each member having one vote. Any member is eligible for office after being six months in the association. At present the operations in the store are confined to groceries, dry goods, and boots and shoes. But these can be expanded or contracted as the members see fit. An effort is made to get the best goods that money can procure, and these are supplied, as far as the officers are concerned, without being adulterated, and at the lower prices. Some idea can be gathered of the growth of the association's business when it is stated that while the sales during its first quarter's existence, to 1st April, 1878, amounted to $691 18, the turn-over for last quarter to July inst. footed up to $8,401 12. The total amount of goods sold during the whole period from April 1, 1878, to 7th July, 1880, was $38,069 74. During that period, and not including last quarter, there has been paid to the members, on account of dividends and interest, a total amount of $2,801 12, and to non-members, $1547 63.

MONTREAL'S TALKED-OF TUNNEL.

From the Montreal Witness, July 30.

It having been stated by parties interested in the South Shore Railway and Tunnel Company's tunnel scheme that the surveys for the work would commence on Monday last, a number of persons visited Hochelaga this week, expecting to witness the operations, but those who went had to return disappointed. To-day a Witness reporter and several of the curious visited the scene, and, so far from anything like a survey being commenced, all was blank and still, the spot where the mouth of the tunnel is expected to be located being occupied with piles of cord-wood. Several prominent Montrealers in conversation to-day expressed themselves skeptical of the scheme. "The tunnel will never pay," was the burden of their belief. The Thames tunnel, one pointed out, cost $12,000,000, and it was not half as long as this would probably be and yet the Thames Tunnel did not pay, although millions of people passed through it in a year. In an interview to-day, with Mr. Walter Shanly that gentleman spoke with all the freedom on the matter that his position as engineer of the work could permit. "I will not pronounce an opinion on the success or otherwise of the St. Lawrence Tunnel," said he. "I certainly have my own opinion, but it is not the matter; my intention is to make the survey as desired, and I shall make a faithful one, and that as rapidly as possible; but, mind you," he continued, "that survey will cost many thousand dollars. To get an entrance for the tunnel will be no small job of expense. As for examining the bed of the river, I will probably be compelled to defer it till the ice takes, since the Harbor Commissioners would scarcely permit vessels to anchor across the river in a manner necessary to make the survey." Mr. Shanly then stated that he would begin the survey probably in a week and a half. His principal assistant, Mr. G. H. Plunkett, civil engineer, arrived yesterday from the United States, and to him will be confided the carrying out of the work generally. The surveys would occupy some two months at shortest.

TURKISH MILITARY PREPARATIONS.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Examiner says: "From a correspondent at Volo, in Thessaly, writing on the 8th inst., I learn that the Turkish Administration is disposing of the various State properties in the province, but, on the other hand, the military preparations for resistance to the Greeks continue unremittingly. There are actually in Southern Thessaly only some 17,000 Turkish troops but they can be readily reinforced from Macedonia. Provisions and munitions of war are being handed at Salapaki at the mouth of the Salamyias, and troops quietly collected at Caterina, a short distance to the north of the point on the Reason where the new Greek frontier has been fixed. On the highest point of Mount Olympus, overlooking Volo, an intrenched camp of a thousand men, with a battery of six guns, has been formed to hold in check the Greeks of the Magnesia peninsula who may feel inclined to take up arms as in 1878. Ibrender Pasha, a Hungarian renegade, is in command of the forces in Armyro, close to the Greek frontier, and his troops are seizing the crops just now being gathered, and subjecting the unfortunate Thessalian peasantry to every exaction, both of goods and bodily service. The head of the Jewish community at Larissa, near Volo, was tortured for the sum for having remonstrated with the Turkish commander of the detachment which had taken possession of his crops. Up to the date of my correspondent's letter the Turks appear to have been making every preparation for active resistance to the decisions of Europe regarding the cession of territory to Greece."

GROWTH OF A MANUFACTURING CITY.

From the Lowell (Mass.) Courier, July 31.

To show how rapidly this city is growing, a few figures may be given. In 1830 the population was 20,981; in 1865, 30,960 (a falling off which shows the blighting effects of the war); in 1868 it had recovered, and was 38,878; in 1870, 40,928; in 1875, 49,677; and in 1880, 59,338. In the past decade we have gained 18,410 souls, an average annual increase of over 1,800. In 1870 the valuation was $22,472,488, and in 1879 it was $29,677,839, a gain of $13,204,351; or deducting the new City Hall, $1,500,000 of value. The number of polls was, in 1870, 8,877; in 1879 the number had grown to 12,528. There is no doubt that the Assessors' returns the present year will materially increase all these figures, and the advance in the valuation may be justly attributed to the cost of new buildings, as the majority of this city are not in the habit of "marking up" to any serious extent. The constant growth is very gratifying, and the outlook for the future contains no sign that it will be checked. Ten years hence, on the same uniform increase accompanying population will number over 80,000. Indeed, we can at once commenced and designate the several sources of increase. True, our water-power, which is the reason of the rise of our city, has virtually been wholly utilized. But improvements in machinery and devices for economizing power are so numerous that the Merrimac is constantly furnishing what is virtually increased power. Scarcely one of the large corporations is making some project for increasing its productive capacity. These are supplemented by scores of smaller enterprises, which make in the aggregate a very handsome showing of business.

THE WOMAN WHO IS NOT PARTICULAR.

Go where you will, you shall see the woman who is not particular. It makes not the least bit of difference in the world to her where she sits or what she has to eat. She is not particular, it makes no difference to her. So she sits in the coolest and best seat of the best train going. Into a rail road train the other day entered this woman who is not particular. She had a child in her arms. In the course of the car were several vacant seats. Most persons would have taken one of them; but when the gentleman with her, presumably her husband, pointed to these seats, the woman replied, sweetly: "Oh, I'm not particular, Harry; I'll sit right down here." And down she sat, with her 150 pounds avoirdupois, not to mention the infant, into the half-seat by the door. You see, the woman's particular. She didn't mind that a lady was already in the seat; she didn't mind that two-thirds of her own body rested on that lady; she didn't mind that that lady was immovably pinned against the iron frame work of the seat; she didn't mind her expostulations; she didn't mind that her baby was mashing the lady's bonnet; she didn't mind the lady's muttered imprecations; she didn't mind that it had dropped its molasses-glazed cake on the lady's lap. Oh, no, she wasn't particular.

FALL OF A BIG ROCK.

From the Idaho Statesman.

A gigantic rock fell into the narrow cañon between Rock Creek and Chanderlain Plain, Elkhead County, Wyoming, recently, from a ledge 1,700 feet high. It struck a band of 75 sheep, killing nearly all of them; then bounded and struck the mountain on the opposite side, breaking in twain, and lodging the fragments in the cañon, one half resting on end of stock, while the other rested itself in place against the side of the cañon, making an unbroken wall across the road, almost back.

PASSING INDIAN SCENES

PUSHING THE INDIANS SOWARD THEIR LAST RESTING-PLACE—THE TRADER OF A FEW YEARS BACK—TRAGICAL INCIDENTS OF SAVAGE RUSE.

CAMP SHERIDAN, Neb., July 28.—The glory of Camp Sheridan and its sister post, Camp Robinson, has departed. The thousand Sioux who a few years since gathered about the neighboring agencies are now scattered far and wide. Some are on the Missouri, some at the new agencies at Pine Ridge and the Rosebud, and some, yielding to the numerous vicissitudes of savage life, have found a final resting-place on the elevated scaffolds that constitute the place of Dakota burial.

An Indian agency, while in existence, presents a most animated scene, being surrounded by thousands of Indians of all ages—men and women, boys and girls, prepared to buy small that their careful mothers have strapped them to the young colts on which they ride. All gather about the Agent's house and the trader's store on the days on which their rations are issued, or the more important occasion on which they receive their semi-annual annuities. The active existence of an agency, however, is not of long duration. Everything appertaining to the American savage seems to be of a fleeting character. Soon after his contact with the white race a war ensues in which the savage suffers defeat. Soon after the termination of the war an agency is established for the benefit of the subjugated Indians. In a few years the inroads of settlers makes necessary the removal of the agency to some point further north or west, which removal is followed by another and another, until the tribe, reduced to a mere band, is finally conveyed to that last repository of the American native—the Indian Territory. Such has been the history of the agencies of the Spotted Tail and Red Cloud bands of the Sioux tribe, who are now occupying their third agency, having been removed from the vicinities of Camps Sheridan and Robinson about two years ago to their present homes at Pine Ridge and Rosebud. The old agency buildings present a most gloomy appearance. Their desolate air may be taken as an index of the present state of the entire country. In old times, fortunes were made in a day; the Indian traders and French squaw men reaped a most abundant harvest. Legend states that on one of the frontier forts a barrel was placed under the counter in which the receipts of the day were deposited. In these palmy days, a Frenchman named Nick Genesse married among the Sioux, one of whose women he married. Nick would import a barrel of alcohol which he would dilute with water, secretly conveyed to the Indian country and buried. With a tin cup full of a judiciously-compounded mixture of alcohol, water, tobacco, and sugar, one, two, or three valuable buffalo robes could be purchased. The same bargain might frequently be concluded through the medium of a flask filled with ounces of white sugar. Nick still lives in the country, but, notwithstanding his early opportunities, is in very moderate circumstances. Like most men of his class, he was of a lavish disposition, and rapidly squandered what was so easily acquired.

Many tragical incidents occurred in those early days. An officer at this post related an exciting interview he once beheld between Spotted Tail and an Indian whose brother he had lately killed. The victim's name was Big Mouth. He was a white man's chief, and on that account, probably, was obnoxious to a large majority of his tribe. Spotted Tail, then more patriotic than at present, shot him in a somewhat cowardly manner. In the evening, Big Mouth's brother appeared in Spotted Tail's tepe arrayed in full war panoply, and bitterly upbraided the murderer for his cowardly act. After the delivery of his denunciation, he deliberately turned and walked from the wigwam. Spotted Tail, said the narrator, appeared exceedingly restive under the indignant tide of reproach vehemently poured forth by his brother. He seized his Henry rifle, and the spectator supposed his foe would never leave the tent alive. He, however, withdrew unharmed. A more tragical scene occurred at a different time and place, resulting in the death of several savages. Yellow Bear, a Dakota chief, ordered a certain half-breed, named Reshaw, not to enter his camp, threatening, in case of disobedience, to shoot him. The half-breed, notwithstanding the injunction, visited the camp of Yellow Bear, who attempted to execute his threat. Reshaw was too quick for him, and killed the chief. Two or three other Indians, who attempted to avenge their chief, were also killed. Finally, Reshaw was slain. His squaw, a woman of the tribe, being apprised of his fate, rushed to the scene, and frantically threw herself on the body of her husband. After bending over him in the vehement style peculiar to the Indians and all wild peoples, she arose, and, arming herself with his axe, proceeded to mangle the bodies of the dead savages. After hacking them sufficiently, she smeared herself with their blood. Then, with her long black hair bedabbled with gore, she gathered her husband in her arms and sat on the ground, rocking to and fro, crooning a savage ditty to the inanimate form.

Those scenes will never be re-enacted on these plains, as the savages have left them forever. They will probably never be enacted again, as the Southern Dakotas have essentially changed their nature. They are not as wild as they were formerly. At the two great agencies are mission schools, &c., where the children are instructed in the arts of civilization. The adults—many of them, at least—work on cultivated farms, receive rations from the Government, and seem to be in full sympathy with their chief, Spotted Tail, who is desirous to behold the practices of civilization firmly established among his people.

A SAPPHO IN THE DOCK.

From the London Telegraph.

It is possible that the Poet may be King. It is more or less possible that he in a golden age was born, and was dowered with all kinds of attributes; still, it is nevertheless certain that, from a Police court point of view, the present times are very parlous ones indeed for poets, and especially poetesses. An old woman of 70 was arraigned at Wandsworth on Saturday, charged with begging in the purlieus of the camp at Wimbledon. She was described as a "law writer," but really she was a bard, and as poor as bards, not being Poets Laureate usually are, practically speaking, and that is saying much. Possibly Homer did the same kind of thing at Chios ages ago. On being searched some money was found in her pockets—an exceptional position. Evidently it had not been for pilfering purposes, her engagement strophes. The defense of this woebegone poetess was that she was paid said she had been an acrostic on his name. She added, with pardonable lyrical pride, that she would compose an acrostic on the name of any gentleman in court in the space of three minutes. But the worthy magistrate, who was in no mood to be accosted in poetic fashion, said that he had a great mind to send her to jail until the Wimbledon Camp was broken up. Ultimately he discharged her with a caution, and the veteran poetess left the dock declaring that she would never write another line, but would seek an asylum in a nunnery at Hammersmith. She might do worse; but it is to be hoped that she would consent for the sake of the public, from composing her lyrical profusions in public. In any case it is to be hoped that we shall be spared a repetition of the painful spectacle of an elderly Sappho in the dock.

EXPLORING THE RED SEA.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

The Swiss are the only nation in Europe who have, as a nation, hitherto done nothing for geographical exploration beyond their own territories, always excepting, of course, the inoveable Turk. To a people hemmed in as the Swiss are, with no seaboard and no ships, this can scarcely be considered a reproach; yet their fondness for wandering is proverbial, and Edward Whymper has just proved how it can be turned to good account in the exploration of our lofty mountains. The development of the foreign trade of Switzerland seems, however, to have at last forced upon the people the necessity of doing a little exploration on their own account. At least, the Swiss Geographical Commercial Society of St. Gall have come to the conclusion that their commercial progress requires a preliminary investigation of both coasts of the Red Sea in order to render them accessible to the direct Swiss trade. The society has decided to fit out a small exploring party to investigate the special nature of the trade at the various coast places, in order to obtain satisfactory information as to the actual or potential import of these ports. The proposed leader of the expedition is Herr Arnold Kunkler, who has spent many years in England and in South America. The cost of the expedition is estimated at less than a thousand pounds.

MADE BLIND BY THE USE OF ARSENIC.

From the Indianapolis Sentinel, July 31.

A case of unusual interest to women, bearing on the use of arsenic to improve the complexion, has recently come to light in the western part of this city. A young lady, handsome and intelligent, has been for a long while using arsenic for her complexion, and recently she has almost lost her eyesight. Not ever began to grow dim about a year ago, and it has been gradually but steadily falling ever since, until it is almost impossible for her to see. Her physician says it is from the use of arsenic. In view of the calamity, her engagement with a young physician of good prospects, which not broken off entirely, has been the subject of the final result of experiments for the restoration of sight.

MAKING A KHAN.

The Calcutta Statesman says: "Much ridicule has been cast upon the diplomacy of our political officers in Afghanistan, and many amusing stories are told of the methods by which our Indian servants have succeeded in raising funds at our expense. One of the most ingenious of these is popularly known as 'making a khan.' A stranger is seen, perhaps, to enter Candahar, and the news circulates the fellow, during his stay, is known and watched by the chief men of the place. With a few days he is seen to be on good terms with the Ameer's officers, who would not be unwilling to treat with the Ameer's officers, who would not be unwilling to treat with the Ameer's officers, who would not be unwilling to treat

As there can never be a fair election in Alabama under Democratic rule, there can be but one result of the election in that State to-day. The Democrats have blotted out one of the vital features of the Registration law which was passed by the Republican Legislature—that requiring the numbering of the ballots—and, as they are in full command of the polls, they will carefully suppress all votes objectionable to their party. The Republicans know very well that this part of the "solid South" is as hopelessly solid against them, so long as Democratic frauds continue, as the bloodiest precincts of Mississippi. They have no ticket for State officers and Legislature, but will combine with all the independent elements opposed to the Democratic ticket in the support of JAMES M. PICKENS. But Alabama does not permit any voting which will seriously threaten the supremacy of the Democracy.

Mr. ALEXANDER H. COFFROTH, of the Seventeenth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, is the special champion of the soldier—Confederate, Union, and of the Mexican war. He is the friend and supporter of the bill to grant pensions to rebel soldiers who were enlisted in the Mexican war. He is also the author of a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for an explanation of the delay in the payment of soldiers' bounty and back pay. It was, probably, by the advice and with the connivance of Mr. ALEXANDER H. COFFROTH that the Secretary's answer to that resolution was suppressed, while party capital was made for the Democrats by the circulation of a constructive falsehood. The reason for this delay was very well known to Mr. ALEXANDER H. COFFROTH when he penned his deceptive resolution, and he knew that the payments were delayed because a Democratic Congress had failed to provide the necessary means. It has been found necessary, at this late day, to contradict the impudent falsehood that the present Administration was in any way responsible for the delay in the payments due to soldiers. And this contradiction is made effectual by the production of the facts which were dishonestly suppressed by a Democratic Congress.

It is evident that the State Department will not have an easy task when it undertakes to satisfy the Spanish Government that American merchant vessels have been illegally detained and fired at while on the high seas. The answer invariably set up is that the vessels were within Spanish jurisdiction, not that the alleged outrages did not occur. It is now charged that the latest act of this kind was committed by a man-of-war when the American complainant was more than fifteen miles from the coast of Cuba. Accidentally or otherwise, each Spanish outrage (or alleged outrage) is more flagrant than those which have preceded it. Spanish insolence is proverbial the world over, and no human being can be more thoroughly possessed with a feeling of his own importance than a Spanish officer on the quarter-deck of a man-of-war. Familiarity with this fact leads some of our own naval officers to predict that we shall have more trouble unless the Spanish Government is brought to a proper sense of its international obligations.

From Vermont we have an extraordinary story of Democratic bull-dozing and intolerance. It appears that a Republican innkeeper, who had made himself obnoxious to his Democratic neighbors on account of his flying a Republican campaign flag, was threatened with violence if he persisted. He kept his flag flying, and was visited at midnight by disguised ruffians, who shamefully maltreated him, after they had again attempted to extort from him a promise to haul down his colors. This is all in exact accordance with the true Democratic spirit, wherever it is found, but it seems more like an incident in Southern politics than a startling event in a Northern State. Fortunately, there are not so many Democrats in Vermont that the peace and quiet of the State are in serious danger.

The very latest expedient for getting rid of the Chinese in California is to tax the Six Companies out of existence. These companies are the guilds to which all Chinese arriving in the Pacific States are attached. It is represented to the State Board of Equalization, by memorial, that the Six Companies "have and hold absolute control over the bodies and liberties of all the Chinese," and that, therefore, they must be extremely rich, and that, instead of their being assessed at a moderate valuation, they should pay taxes on $23,200,000, or some such modest sum. Of course, it is expected that this excessive rate of assessment and taxation would be resisted, but as this would only lead to the seizure and confiscation of Chinese property in San Francisco, the desired end—the eviction of the Chinamen—would be reached. And the Chinese problem remains unsolved.

THE SERIOUS SIDE OF IT.

Although the emptiness of Gen. HANCOCK's letter of acceptance and the coarse demagogism of that of Mr. ENGLISH are calculated to excite contempt and ridicule, the occasion is one of such grave importance as to give a serious aspect to the matter. These men are the candidates of one of the great political parties into which the people of the country are divided; a party which claims the support of intelligent citizens in a canvass involving weighty questions of administration and of governmental policy. If it has no better ground for its claims than is presented in these letters, that is of itself a matter of no small significance, and must enter into the considerations by which men are to be influenced in their political conduct. The fulsome praise which Democratic organs bestow upon the "broad statesmanship" of Gen. HANCOCK's sophomorical composition are too absurd for serious attention, but it is assumed in some quarters that he deliberately, and with more or less of political sagacity, evaded the practical questions of the time for the purpose of presenting nothing for attack. He said a variety of undisputed things "in such a solemn way" because they could not be disputed and everybody would have to agree to them. If this were so it would be discreditable enough, but the device, shallow as it would be, would be a presumption of more depth in the man than he gives any evidence of. The fact is that the emptiness of his letter is a fair indication of the state of his head. He writes like a school-boy because he has the mind of a school-boy, just capable of grasping the conventional generalities of our politics, but utterly devoid of insight and of practical ideas. Anybody can descant on the nature of our Government and the importance of its proper administration, but, in the words of the astute Polonius:

"To expostulate
What majesty should be, what duty is,
Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time."

Gen. HANCOCK says that the latest amendments of the Constitution are inviolable, and their full force and effect are not to be impaired or evaded. This is to be presumed, but the chance for dispute lies in the interpretation of their "full force and effect" and the means to be taken to prevent their evasion. The main purpose of the fourteenth amendment is to secure equal rights among citizens, and at least one Democratic Judge has attempted to interpret the life out of it, and the legislation to give it effect is strenuously resisted in certain Southern States. The maintenance of its spirit and purpose is a grave practical question of which the candidate shows no comprehension, while the controlling power of his party is against it. The fifteenth amendment prohibits the denial or abridgment of the right to vote on account of color, and gives Congress power to enforce the prohibition by appropriate legislation. To accept this in vague general professions is quite a different thing from giving it due effect. How stands Gen. HANCOCK in regard to the means of doing this? How his party stands we know. He is in favor of a free ballot and a fair count; at least he says so. That is well; no decent man would avow anything else. But in several States these blessings notoriously do not exist, on account of the infamous proceedings of the party in the South on which Gen. HANCOCK relies for support. There are laws through which the Federal authority, so far as its jurisdiction goes, endeavors to secure honest elections. Their enforcement is resisted by the Democratic Party, and it has done its worst to get rid of them. Does the fledgling candidate believe in these laws and their execution, or in any practical method of securing the same end? If not, of what use are his platitudes about a free ballot and a fair count? He believes in an efficient and honest civil service, but as to the methods of securing it he is as helpless as a child. As to measures and policies for promoting our material interests, he cannot even compass a generality that has sense at the bottom of it. The election of such a man to the Presidential office would be a serious matter for the country. Its immediate consequences are altogether obvious. He would be putty in the hands of the party leaders, and the controlling force among these leaders would be the ex-Confederates of the South. Their will would be wrought in regard to the vital enforcement of the amendments, the execution of election laws, the reform of the civil service, the care of financial interests, and the promotion of material well-being.

Mr. ENGLISH has one reason, and only one, for asking the support of the people for his party. That is that the other party has been in power too long and there ought to be a change. The people are likely to consider whether there are good reasons for the change proposed and whether the result would be a better state of things. The candidate for Vice-President repeats the stale charge that there are irregularities and corruptions in the Republican Administration which can only be exposed and corrected by transferring the conduct of affairs to its opponents. Making a vague and unsubstantiated charge like this is easy enough, and it might be brought against the Ruler of the Universe by any one of sufficient presumption. There are no secrets about the administration of the Government. The collection and disbursement of the revenues, the general management of the finances, the conduct of the various departments of the Administration are public matters. There is nothing hid, or that can be effectually hid, about them; and, besides, half a score of Democratic rummaging committees have had everything laid open to them with wonderfully barren results in the way of electioneering material. Mr. ENGLISH knows the charge is not true, and it is a question whether such a hypocritical shift is to take the place of positive ideas and principles in regard to the conduct of public affairs. When a party is reduced to such an extremity that it can present no better reasons for being intrusted with the government of a great nation, situated as this Republic is, the question is not so much whether it should be placed in power as whether it has any excuse for a continued existence. Taken at the estimate of its candidates, it holds no definite ground whatever on the vital questions of the day, and, therefore, lacks the qualifications even of a respectable opposition.

THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

The most noteworthy feature of the report which the Board of Visitors for the Military Academy have made to President HAYES is not what it says, but what it scrupulously avoids saying. It ignores the Whittaker sensation, refraining even from a constructive allusion to it. It awards high praise to the discipline and police of the Academy, declares that the prescribed regulations for its government have been "fully and faithfully executed," and avers that the Visitors have "not seen or heard of anything in the administration or the discipline which would suggest the propriety of a change, either in the articles or in the mode of enforcement." It affirms, and truly enough, that the system at West Point fosters and enforces order, neatness, regularity in habits, promptness and precision in obedience, manliness, self-reliance, and truth; and it claims that "no ground of complaint is possible" so long as the system of discipline is carried out precisely as it stands, since each Cadet "is made to feel that his success or failure depends upon himself alone." It is clear, therefore, that the Visitors had not heard, or were not thinking, of the case of Cadet WHITTAKER in making their report, or, still better, that they had concluded to act on Mr. Podsnap's principle and "wave it away." And no doubt they decided wisely in so doing; for entirely ignoring the year's chief event, out of the routine, was preferable to a mere mention of it, while the task of adjudicating upon it was none of theirs.

The second field of inspection for the Visitors, as we take the liberty of classifying the subjects embraced in their report, included the material condition of the Academy. Like everybody else who visits the beautiful spot, they found the buildings and grounds in exquisite order. The water supply and sewerage, which former boards complained of, the Visitors of last June found to have been properly enlarged and improved. The new hospital was observed to have been built in a substantial manner, and they recommended Congress to appropriate the small sum needed for its completion, especially as then the old hospital will afford additional officers' quarters, now much needed. They also urge the building of additional barrack room, for many of the rooms are now occupied by three Cadets each; also advise, too, the construction of a bathing-house, as several Cadets have been drowned on the exposed and perilous river front where they now bathe. The food and clothing are bought with care, and judiciously distributed; the accounts of Major DU BARRY are as accurate, neat, and clear as they could possibly be—in short, all the housekeeping arrangements at West Point are perfect, in the opinion of this Board of Visitors, as they are in the opinion of most volunteer and unheralded visitors.

But when from the moral and material the Visitors pass to the intellectual state of the Cadets, they find a drawback to the success of the Academy in what they regard as the too low standard of admission—this defect operating to consume much valuable time in purely elementary instruction, at enormous expense to the Government. "It would seem," add the Visitors, "that instruction in spelling, in arithmetic, in the rudiments of English grammar, and in punctuation, ought not to be required of Professors and officers who are subsequently to teach mathematics, philosophy, chemistry, geology, and law." The objection here stated has often been made; indeed, is annually made; it is partly founded in reason; and yet we fancy that its importance is apt to be overstated, at least by civilian Visitors, especially if they have any literary pretensions. The studies of the first year in the Academy are Algebra, Geometry, French, tactics, and fencing and bayonet exercising. There is no formal place here for the elementary studies spoken of, and of course they would be found in the first year, if in any. It is difficult to believe that a great deal of "valuable time, at enormous expense," can be consumed in occasionally correcting faults of grammar, including spelling and punctuation, though sometimes such corrections are required even in the higher classes of the best colleges.

Besides, these very attainments in arithmetic, punctuation, and so on, which the visitors mention, are already required in the standard of admission. Section 1,819 of the Revised Statutes runs as follows:

"Appointees shall be examined under regulations to be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of War before they shall be admitted to the Academy; and shall be required to be well versed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and to have a knowledge of the elements of English grammar, of descriptive geography, particularly that of the United States, and of the history of the United States."

It is clear, therefore, that the present standard, low or not, requires a candidate to be "well versed" in arithmetic, and to know the elements of grammar, which certainly should include the orthography of words. Now if, in addition, anybody who is interested in the matter will turn to chapter eight, "Nature of the Preliminary Examination," in Lieut. FARROW's little book on West Point, he will find that this examination is tolerably thorough and extensive within the prescribed limits, and that "the written examination is carefully watched for spelling, and the oral for grammatical expressions." The truth is that the Academy being ready each year with all its costly appurtenances and its staff of instructors, such material for a new class must be taken as is offered. The competition for admission is not free to all, but limited to certain appointees, and all that can be done is to take appointees. Were the standard raised and the appointees still no better qualified, how would that help matters? It is noteworthy that for all the strictly military acquisitions of the Cadets and their admirable drill, the Visitors have unqualified praise, and for their country's uses genius in gunnery is certainly more valuable than juggling with grammar, and the effective use of the bayonet than immaculate punctuation.

Still, as applied to the duty of the appointing powers to send up candidates better versed in the preliminary studies, the admonition of the Visitors is timely. More than a hundred Cadets, during the past four years, have been recommended for dismissal on the ground of deficiency in studies, and many more were permitted to honorably resign for the same cause. A dismissal entails "a loss amounting to about $1,750 per annum for each and every Cadet;" carelessness in sending to the Academy youth not bright at learning is a serious financial loss to the country, besides keeping the classes smaller than the public "plant," so to speak, could educate. The Visitors hit a fault, too, which ought to be remedied, and could easily be remedied, if it be true, as they allege, that "not one Cadet in ten speaks distinctly" in recitation. Their recommendation of an increase of the library is probably well founded. For the Cadets, the sting of this report will probably not be what is said about indistinct speaking, but its recommendation that the use of tobacco shall hereafter be prohibited, under the severest penalties. That edict would cause mourning and consternation.

CONCORD AND CHAUTAUQUA.

The Concord School of Philosophy and the religious and educational assemblies at Chautauqua have developed into what we are accustomed to call "institutions." A few years ago they had not been heard of or had attracted the attention of only a small and interested circle. They have passed from experiment to success. They seem this year to have reached the full maturity of vigor, and to have taken on a national character. Philosophers from beyond the Mississippi are lecturing at Concord, and men and women from all over the country give and receive instruction in the groves of Chautauqua. This return to the Academic method of mental cultivation cannot be too highly commended. It is evidence of a genuine and healthy intellectual appetite. It is flattering to our national self-esteem. If we were a sluggish-minded people, or imbued with a pedantic spirit, we could show nothing like this. The success of the movement is based on our mental alertness and keen desire to learn something new. To a great extent, the knowledge sought at these two academies is for its own sake. Our young and raw nation has at length reached a point where a portion of its people can leave practical questions for pursuits purely intellectual, having no relation to dollars and cents. That is a mark of growth. We experienced a need, and a new organ was developed to meet it. A score or more of thoughtful men with a turn for metaphysical speculation or ethical inquiry, desiring to interchange ideas and offer the fruits of their thinking to all who desired to partake of them, and finding no adequate machinery for the purpose, revived the academy of PLATO in the Concord apple orchard. So COMENIUS's plan of an academic city is transferred from the banks of the Danube to the shores of Chautauqua Lake, because our schools and colleges were too staid or languid to yield to the fresh, pushing, creative spirit which felt that it had outgrown that set, hard educational method which proceeds on the theory that boys, like peas, are all alike.

The philosophers at Concord will, perhaps, object to any mention of their advanced pursuits in the same breath with what they would probably call the Sunday-school scheme for elementary instruction at Chautauqua. Deep philosophic speculation is apt to foster intellectual pride and exclusiveness. This claim to a higher calling, beyond the ken of the vulgar world, has at least been put forth in their behalf, though, perhaps, not with their sanction. It is not for an instant to be admitted. They are engaged in a praiseworthy effort to make man wiser and better, and are to be respected for their good intentions and industry, just as miners and railroad laborers are. But we are to stand in awe of one no more than of the other. The common people understand these philosophers very well when they talk sense, and none can understand them when they talk nonsense. These gentlemen should remember that there is nothing peculiar about the business which draws them together. There is no luxury so cheap as a system of philosophy. It is within reach of the humblest. They should remember, too, that of all fields of human thought or enterprise this is the one in which the smallest substantial and lasting success has been gained. There has been a liberal sprinkling of speculative philosophers in every age, from the remotest to the present, but none of them have ever settled anything beyond dispute. Each philosopher's system was, and is, his own, and, unless he be a mere imitator, is generally incompatible with all others. Most of them, in seeking to unwind creation and get at its secret, have fumbled the subject, like a kitten playing with a ball of yarn. Meanwhile the world waits patiently for some clear and tangible result from their labors. Still they are to be respected for their honest endeavors. We are not to indulge in hasty exclamations even when a Concord philosopher gravely informs us that the beautiful in nature is never comprehended save when the soul is concentred with the universe, and assimilates all space. These professors and lecturers would one and all reject with scorn the philosophical teachings of HOBBES, of Malmesbury, but some of them literally accept and act upon his saying, that words are the wise man's counters, but the fool's money. It happens, however, that those who make their words mean anything they choose, and are thus intelligible only to themselves, have really nothing to say that it is worth any man's while to listen to. The discourses of the others will repay the closest attention, as the outgivings of well-stored minds, stimulated to their highest working power by contact with a kindred and sympathetic audience.

The work at Chautauqua is, in part, of a practical character, as many teachers go there to add to their equipment. The school of languages has proved to be one of the most useful features of the assembly. Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and the modern tongues are taught by the natural method—that is, conversationally from the beginning, the study of grammatical forms being introduced later on. It is found that pupils make distinct progress in mastering a vocabulary and gaining power of expression in the six or eight weeks spent at Chautauqua. The most beneficial result achieved, however, is in the dissemination of the principles of the natural method. A hundred or more teachers are drilled in it each year and carry it into their own work. The school by the lake-side is thus spreading the leaven and helping on the revolution that will ultimately crowd out of use the old, laborious way of mastering foreign languages. In the study of literature, art, and the general methods of teaching, some excellent work is being done at Chautauqua. The programme of lectures affords an ample range in the choice of subjects, and the time of year in which the sessions are held enables teachers or professional men to combine the advantages of study with the pleasures of a vacation.

SCIENTIFIC TYRANNY.

The wide-spread unwillingness of mankind to believe in the existence of the sea-serpent is a striking illustration of the debasing influence of science. In this philosopher-ridden age free thought is crushed. We are compelled to believe what scientific persons tell us, and if here and there a fearless man ventures to express a doubt of protoplasm or to deny the infallibility of TYNDALL, he is instantly reviled as being no better than an open believer in Christianity, and is hunted out of scientific circles. The scientific men have agreed to deny the existence of the sea-serpent, and it is as much as any one's reputation for sanity and good morals is worth to believe the conclusive evidence that the sea-serpent is a reality.

If we put aside all the assertions which have been made as to the appearance of sea-serpents in the neighborhood of sea-side hotels, there still remains a mass of unimpeachable evidence. On half a dozen occasions the sea-serpent has passed within a few yards of vessels at sea and has been seen by entire ships' companies. It is quite possible that a mass of floating sea-weed, or a school of fish, when seen at a distance of a mile or more, may be mistaken for a huge marine animal, but it is impossible that hundreds of intelligent men should make such a mistake concerning an object within a few feet of them. The popular scientific hypothesis by which this repeated account of the appearance of a sea-serpent close to a vessel is explained, is simply whisky. This hypothesis will not bear the slightest examination. There is not whisky enough in any one place to account for the amount of sea-serpent that has been seen. For example, some years ago a sea-serpent passed close under the stern of a British man-of-war, and was seen by fully two hundred men, as the affidavits duly made on the spot conclusively prove. Now, on the scientific hypothesis, that ship's company must have drank at least two thousand pints of whisky within a few days of the alleged occurrence. That amount is the very least that could have brought a crew of hardened men-of-war's men up to the snake-seeing point. It is folly to pretend that whisky is thus lavished upon British seamen, and accordingly, in this case the whisky hypothesis fails to the ground. The same reasoning will show that this hypothesis does not explain the five or six other instances in which sea-serpents have been seen close at hand by a whole ship's company. They can only be explained by admitting the existence of the sea-serpent, or by charging hundreds of men with purposeless perjury. We believe that Lake Albert in Central Africa exists, although we have only the testimony of five witnesses, exclusive of native Kings. Why should we deny the existence of the sea-serpent, when at least a thousand witnesses have testified that they have seen it?

But, argues the scientific person, if there were such animals as sea-serpents they would be captured, or at least the remains of dead sea-serpents would be found. Until within a few years this argument was used to prove that the gigantic cuttle was a mere fable, and the evidence of men who had seen it was rejected, until at last the animal was accidentally captured on the Newfoundland coast. That we do not find dead sea-serpents on the shore proves nothing. How often do we find dead whales or dead sharks? When the wild animals die, whether on land or sea, they select retired places. Thousands of birds must die every year, but who can find a dead bird, unless it has been shot by man or captured by a cat? Shall we deny the existence of wild rabbits because they die where their bodies are not found, instead of ringing our front door bells and announcing that they are about to die on the front piazza?

Then there is the favorite scientific argument that the sea-serpent is a myth, because it is represented as having humps on its back, contrary to the usual fashion prevailing among snakes. We may admit the force of this argument, but it simply goes to show that the sea-serpent is not, strictly speaking, a serpent. He is a monster with a serpentine neck, but we need not assume that he is a snake.

In all probability the sea-serpent is a monster closely akin to the extinct plesiosaurus. That pleasing reptile had the head of a crocodile, the neck of a serpent, and the body of a fish. A great many enormous and remarkable animals existed in the period when the plesiosaurus swam the seas. So, likewise, a great many plants and shell-fish existed in that early geological period, and a number of them still survive. Is it unreasonable to suppose that a few of the gigantic and numerous lizards of the lias period may have been left over until the present day? If so, the humps on the neck and back of the so-called sea-serpent are readily explicable, and, in fact, only render him the more probable.

There is, moreover, positive evidence as to the saurian character of the sea-serpent. In 1808 a sea-serpent measuring between thirty and forty feet in length was cast ashore on one of the Scotch islands, and a fisherman made a rude drawing of him, which closely resembled Mr. B. WATERHOUSE HAWKINS's charming reproduction of the plesiosaurus. There is no reason to doubt the honesty of the fisherman's drawing. He had certainly never seen a model of the plesiosaurus, and it is taxing the Scottish imagination too highly to charge him with having invented his monster.

During the present Summer we shall probably have several accounts of the appearance of sea-serpents. In the interest of the unhappy persons who may see them, and who will, therefore, be promptly charged with intoxication, let us protest against the scientific denial of the sea-serpent's existence. We have born the yoke of science long enough. Let us have a great protestant revival, and proclaim our emancipation from scientific tyranny by maintaining the existence of the sea-serpent.

There is something quite pathetic in the way M. CARBONNIER, a very well-known fish-culturist, writes in regard to the macropod, the Chinese paradise fish, and the efforts he made to save these fish during the Franco-Prussian war. Having had the parent fish brought to him from China in 1869, he was the possessor of some 800 fry of different ages. In the Spring of 1870, from too late spawning, only 50 fish were alive. To complete the measure of his misfortunes, in 1870 the mother macropod died. But it seems that the paradise fish become adult at an early period, and soon the French Chinese fish reproduced their kind, and M. CARBONNIER was happy again with a young family of some 8,000 fish. But when the Prussians surrounded Paris with their circle of fire and iron, Gen. MOLTKE paid no respect to fish-culture. As these fish are very delicate and require a warm temperature when young, our fish-culturist used to nurse the fish in water kept up to the proper temperature by means of gas-burners. We know how BERNARD DE PALISSY took his furniture and fed his kiln with beds, chairs, and tables, being too poor to buy faggots. M. CARBONNIER did precisely like his distinguished countryman, and when his gas was cut off, "burned everything that was combustible in order to keep his fish alive and to save them from freezing." Fighting and fish-rearing divided M. CARBONNIER's time during the siege of Paris. Four days in the week he was working at the aquaria containing the macropods, and the other three he was shooting Prussians on the ramparts. "But in spite of all my cares," writes this piscatorial patriot, "I could not supply the want of food, and it was in vain that I shared with my fishes my meagre ration of horseflesh." This is, indeed, the poetry of fish-culture. To deliver his dearly-beloved fish from the Commune, after the surrender of Paris, M. CARBONNIER sought Champigny, where he had formerly kept his fish in the most comfortable manner. But the Prussians had sacked Champigny. There were no ponds—no fishes. In this solitude M. CARBONNIER settled down with his piscine family. With the fishes as his only companions, he tried to forget the disasters of the war and his own ruin. He was resigned to life, providing his fish would share his misery. The fish were not ungrateful. They throve, and in August of the same year he was blessed with 600 fish that were ready to spawn. "You see," writes M. CARBONNIER, in his paper addressed to the Société d'Acclimatation, "what patience and perseverance I have exercised, and that at last success has richly rewarded me." One need not be surprised at M. CARBONNIER's love for the macropods, because these fish seem to have the family instinct more strongly developed than others of their species. They tend their progeny and float the eggs in air-bubbles, nice aquatic cradles, which they blow up themselves. If the American Fish-cultural Association ever confers on foreigners the title of honorary member, such a distinction should be at once offered to M. CARBONNIER.

The report of the Superintendent of the Insurance Department for the year 1878 contains a table showing the number of lineal ancestors of a husband and wife, and their number of lineal descendants, in 12 generations. Starting from a single pair, there were 4 parents, 8 grandparents, 16 great-grandparents, and so on, until, in the twelfth generation back, they had 4,096, making a total of 8,190 ancestors. This, of course, is the necessary fact; in the other direction, the table assumes that each pair have 4 children, so that the constant multiplier is 4, and, in the twelfth generation, the number of 4,194,304 descendants is reached, or 5,592,404 total. The report somewhat rhetorically puts the result thus: "If we go back only a dozen generations in the direct ancestral line, the blood of 8,190 different persons commingles with that of our own children, and in each one of these ancestors' veins flowed a scarlet current of life equally freighted with infinite ancestral tendencies; in the descending line, assuming husband and wife to have 4 children, and that this double or quadruple multiplication will continue for only 4 generations, we see that our own blood will inspire or misguide 5,592,404 human beings." This assumption of increase is clearly excessive, and calculations of population based upon it would startle even the most positive Malthusian. The table has no particular usefulness, and yet it may serve as an illustration of heredity, for it shows that we need not go back to the argument that our descent from a single pair makes us all brethren in order to prove that we are all related to one another by ties of blood. It is becoming more generally admitted that the spiritual nature, as well as the physical, is what Dr. HOLMES has recently called it—"a natural endowment, like a musical ear." Unquestionably, birth sets our feet in ruts already worn deep for us by some of the thousands in our line who have preceded us; and while admission of this fact does not obliterate moral accountability, realization of its import may temper harshness of judgment. But for those who possibly distress, or, more probably, seek to excuse, themselves by pleading at bar an inherited bias, there is this consideration: such bias must at least be the net result of various and contradictory natures, and the wicked ancestor in one generation is opposed in us by the saintly one in another. Moreover, as the genealogical tree widens its inflexibility decreases; if Blackbeard, the pirate, was in our line, the piracy in his blood must have been diluted out of appreciable effect before it reached ours. We need trouble ourselves, at most, only about our quite immediate ancestors—when we have to prefix "great" more than twice we can leave those old fathers and mothers of ours undisturbed, unless we are hankering for food for the pride of descent.

The recent burning of Prof. MOMMSEN's library treasures at Charlottenburg, and the loss of many invaluable manuscripts last him by the fire-rats of Rome, Vienna, and Paris naturally draws attention to the distinguished Danish scholar and scholar. THEODOR MOMMSEN, who will be 67 the 30th of the coming November, was born at Garding, in Sleswig; was in boyhood a pupil of his father, a Pastor in the Lutheran Church, and afterward went to the Universities of Altona and Kiel to study law, philosophy, and history, having been graduated at Kiel in his twenty-sixth year. Have ing been a private teacher for some time, he obtained sufficient assistance from the Academy of Berlin to defray his expenses for a course of travel in France and Italy. He was absent for three years, (1844-7,) absorbed in the study of the antiquities of both countries, and storing his mind with archæological knowledge. Returning next year to his native land, he prepared a number of learned articles for the Journal of Sleswig-Holstein, of which he soon took charge. He also published from time to time the results of his investigations in the annals of the Archæological Institute of Rome and the Herculaneum Academy of Naples. Having been appointed Professor of Law at Leipsic, he discharged his duties, but speedily lost his place on account of his active liberalism in politics. He was very outspoken in his opinions, which he had fully expressed time and again in leading articles written for the Journal. In 1852 he was called to the Chair of Titular Law at Zurich, and two years later to the same chair at Breslau. Some 26 years ago he was chosen Professor of Roman Law at Berlin, and has remained there ever since. His time has long been devoted to those branches of ancient history and archæology with which his name is now so widely and creditably associated. Among his most valuable contributions to those departments of knowledge are "De Collegiis et Sodalitiis," the "Roman Tribes from an Administrative Point of View," "Dialects of Lower Italy," "Corpus Inscriptionum Neapolitanarum," the "Monetary System of the Romans," and "Roman History"—the last and most famous having been translated into divers languages. MOMMSEN is not only a scholar—he is an original thinker, and a man who has the largest and sincerest sympathies with his race. He is a marvelous student. No amount of application seems to affect his health. He not infrequently pores over his books and manuscripts day and night, and to this fact is due the accident which has caused him such distress. It is a singular coincidence that his predecessor at Berlin, also a Dane, and author of a celebrated history of Rome, BARTHOLD NIEBUHR, met with similar casualty. His library was burned, too, and the loss in his old age so preyed upon the scholar's mind that he never quite recovered from the shock. The sympathy felt with MOMMSEN at Berlin is universal, for those wholly opposed to his political views esteem and admire him as a man. He bears the literary calamity cheerfully, and is confident of soon repairing the great damage he has sustained.

The Court of Appeal of the English Divorce Court lately affirmed the judgment of the court below in a very remarkable case. The petitioner was committee of the estate of WILLIAM BAKER, a lunatic, and he prayed the dissolution of BAKER's marriage, on the ground of his wife's adultery. The petition had no exact precedent. The case which came nearest to it was the celebrated Mordaunt suit, in which Sir CHARLES MORDAUNT prayed for, and after protracted appeals obtained, the dissolution of his marriage from his wife (found guilty of infidelity) during her insanity. Against the prayer of BAKER's committee it was urged that the husband, if he recovered his senses, might condone her offenses, and the Judge observed aient this that the possibility of a husband pardoning his wife is not to be regarded as remote, but is, in fact, as the records of his court show, a fact of every day occurrence. But, on the other hand, great wrong might accrue by denying proceedings against the adulterous wife of a lunatic, since she might be left in possession of property settled on her by her husband, which she and her paramour might enjoy, to the exclusion of the lunatic. She might exercise power of appointment in favor of the paramour, or the children of her and his adultery, or a spurious offspring might be foisted upon her husband and his family, by which the devolution of estates or titles might be diverted in aid of illegitimate objects. But the consideration which pressed most upon the court against giving the relief sought was this: If a person holding (as Roman Catholics do) the dissolution of a marriage to be unlawful in the sight of God should have the misfortune to become insane, his committee might, from some question of money, obtain a decree absolving his marriage. But this and all other considerations he held to be overpowered by the decision of the House of Lords in the Mordaunt case, which amounted to this—that as proceedings for divorce are civil, recourse must be had in such case to the ordinary forms of civil courts, where lunatics are litigants, albeit, no provision for the case of lunacy is contained in the act. His decision was, therefore, that the insanity of a husband or wife is not a bar to a suit by the committee for the dissolution of a lunatic's marriage.

THE ALABAMA ELECTION.

The State election in Alabama occurs to-day. State officers, and a Legislature which will elect a United States Senator in the place of the Hon. George S. Houston, deceased, will be chosen. The Hon. Luke Pryor is temporarily filling the vacancy in the Senate, by appointment of the Governor. For State officers the Democrats have a full ticket in the field, headed by Rufus W. Cobb, the present incumbent, for Governor. The Republicans have made no nominations, but have been advised by their State Committee to support a so-called Greenback-Labor and Independent ticket headed by James M. Pickens. The Legislature last chosen was almost unanimously Democratic, the Senate being composed of 30 Democrats and 2 Independent Democrats, and the House of Representatives of 8 Republicans, 91 Democrats, 4 Independent Democrats, and 2 Nationals, giving the straight-out Democrats a clear majority of 119 over all opponents of whatever kind. In the Legislature of 1877 the Democrats had a majority of 82 on joint ballot. In both cases they perhaps might have made it unanimous as easily as not, had they preferred. The following table of previous votes of the State on the general ticket may be of interest:

Year.	Office.	Rep.	Dem.
1878	Governor	68,761	69,581
1876	President	85,708	102,068
1876	Governor	85,628	99,268
1874	Governor	58,988	107,718
1872	President	90,272	79,444
1872	Governor	89,808	81,271

The Representatives in Congress will be chosen in November.

CAMPAIGN NOTES.

The Michigan Republican State Convention will be held in Jackson on Thursday next.

Capt. George D. Wise, the regular Democratic candidate for Congress in the Third District of Virginia, is opposed to the readjustment policy.

The Georgia Democratic State Convention will be held at Atlanta on Wednesday, and the lively fight to settle who shall be the candidate for Governor will then be ended, probably.

The Portland Oregonian says that the local Democratic papers in Oregon have given up all hopes of carrying that State for Hancock, and are devoting their entire energies to the canvass in distant States.

A Richmond paper which makes every man who served in the rebel Army, with one exception, at least a Colonel, is very careful to say "Mr." N. P. Banks all through a very long article. The matter is of no consequence, except as affording a little amusement.

Judge Ralph P. Buxton, Republican candidate for Governor of North Carolina, has tendered the resignation of his judicial office, to take effect to-day. He will at once begin a canvass of the State. The number of his joint discussions with his Democratic opponent has been increased.

Gen. J. N. Hungerford, of Corning, has followed Senator S. T. Hayt's example and withdrawn as a candidate for the Republican nomination for Congress in the Twenty-ninth District of this State, magnanimously saying that it is essential that all undue strife for local office and place should be avoided for the general good.

Fifty-six delegates to the Greenback Convention in the First Congressional District of Maine, bolted the nomination of the Copperhead, "Gen." S. J. Anderson. They organized a new convention, and one of them said

THE FASTER IN A BAD WAY

REPORTS FROM CLARENDON HALL NOT ENCOURAGING.

EVIDENCES OF DR. TANNER'S STEADILY DECREASING STRENGTH—A CONSTANT DEMAND FOR WET TOWELS—SLIGHT FEVER AND A DRY AND HARSH SKIN.

Irrespective of conflicting medical opinions, and of the diagnostics of opposing regular and eclectic practitioners, it was evident at a glance to the trained eye of the physiologist, yesterday afternoon, that Dr. Tanner's condition is extremely critical. His countenance wore the deathly pallor and anxiety that are uniformly associated with gastric disturbance, and his exhaustion was so extreme that he did not attempt to leave his cot in the south gallery until the middle of the afternoon, when he made an abortive effort to rise and dress himself, which terminated in his sitting down upon the edge of his cot in a condition nearly allied to swoon. His appearance has altered to an extraordinary degree within the last 48 hours. His limbs are wasted and attenuated almost to the mere skeleton representation of limbs, and his hands are nearly transparent. Owing to the configuration of the mouth, the repulsive and wolfish protrusion of the teeth and the retraction of the lips which so often accompany the last stages of starvation have not yet presented themselves, and his expression of countenance is still pleasant and comparatively natural. His voice, also, retains its vigor and distinctness. Originally full and sonorous, there is something incongruous between the firm, distinct, decisive intonation with which his requests are made and the wasted figure lying curled up upon the cot by the window, the grizzled head half smothered in the folds of a rubber blanket, and the knees drawn up, as they always are in cases of gastric disturbance.

The two favorable symptoms are the persistent drowsiness and the absence of all tendency to incoherence or delirium. At times the irritability of the nervous system is nearly uncontrollable, and he speaks in a quick, impatient tone, which indicates the nervous tension under which he is suffering. But this has at no time passed beyond the limits of momentary irritation and querulous complaint. There are none of those causeless explosions of passion which foreshadow nervous breaking down, nor has the settled taciturnity of the last three days ever for a moment passed into the despondent gloom that is equally significant. There are at present no cerebral symptoms, and thus far the indications are favorable; but how much such symptoms may appear no medical prescience can foretell, particularly in a case in which abstinence from food has already been protracted far beyond the limits of previous observation, and evidences either of gastric inflammation or of gastric congestion have already disclosed themselves. The ejected matter in these paroxysms of vomiting still consists of the secretion of the mucous membrane, faintly tinged with biliary acids. A microscopic examination disclosed the presence of colored corpuscles of the blood in a decomposed state, of epithelial cells, mucous corpuscles, and minute sections of mucous membrane, together with crystals of biliary acids. There was very little blood present—not enough to indicate anything more than a passive congestion, and crystals of the coloring matter of the blood were not noticed, although the presence of this constituent was indicated by the color.

The fasting man rested tolerably well until after midnight, and he may rally this morning, as he did on Friday morning after the grave symptoms that alarmed his medical attendants on Thursday. But he has been growing steadily feebler since Saturday afternoon, and 34 days without food count for something even against an iron will backed by an iron constitution. He will finish his thirty-fifth day at noon to-day, and enter upon his thirty-sixth. The only hope is that he may lie in a semi-torpid condition until his task is finished—that is, for the next five days. To expect that he will rally again until nourishment is given him, would be to expect the unprecedented.

At 12 o'clock on Saturday night, when Drs. J. J. Goodman and R. T. Osborne relieved Dr. Hosber, Dr. Tanner was sleeping restlessly and seemed to be extremely annoyed at the whispered conversation of his attendants. Having lain in this condition for about two and a half hours, he awoke and asked for a wet towel about his head. This was 2:40 A. M. He now lay quietly asleep, without symptoms of restlessness, until 4:40 A. M. At intervals there were symptoms of gastric disturbance in the emission of gases, but not sufficient to disturb his slumber. At 4:40 A. M. he awoke, and lay for about 20 minutes, conversing occasionally with his attendants, among whom were Drs. W. M. Molesworth, Charles S. Allen, and W. Alexander Watson, of the eclectic school, in addition to the two regular practitioners already named. A lady sent him a bouquet by Dr. Allen, which was received with thanks and appeared to give the recipient a great deal of pleasure. While inhaling the fragrance of the flowers he fell asleep again, and lay until 7 A. M. in refreshing slumber.

At 7 o'clock Drs. Charles E. Griswold and J. Wilson relieved Drs. Molesworth and Watson. Dr. Tanner was still sleeping quietly without symptoms of uneasiness, and so continued until 9:20, when he asked to have the towel saturated with cold water again and adjusted about his head. Dr. Politzer relieved his predecessors of the regular school at 9:20, but the fasting man was not yet awake, and the usual greetings were not exchanged. At 10 o'clock A. M. Dr. Tanner was still sleeping. At this hour Drs. Leonard and Reilly relieved Drs. Wilson and Griswold. Dr. Tanner slept without interruption until 10:50, when he again asked for a wet towel about his head, and lay listening to some ballads sung by Dr. Griswold and ladies with him for half an hour or more. At 11:20 he was lying quietly in his cot in the south gallery, but was evidently not asleep. At 12 M. he asked to have the head-lines of what the morning papers had to say of his case read to him; after this he dropped into a doze, from which he did not awake until 2:30 o'clock, when Prof. Gunn, Prof. Wark, and Dr. Pelroz, taking advantage of a momentary interval of wakefulness, proceeded to take and register the physical indications. The application of the sphygmograph to the radial artery furnished a series of tracings comparing very favorably with those of the preceding day, but showing, on the whole, a gradual loss in volume and cardiac impulse. The pulse was 78, feeble, compressible, and thready, the temperature 98° to 98 2-5°; muscular strength, as shown by the dynamometer, 68 kilogrammes in the right and 81 in the left hand. Dr. Tanner conversed a few minutes with Dr. Gunn with regard to a projected biography of himself, and then, at 2:55 P. M., arose from his cot and made a feeble effort to dress himself. But his limbs refused to perform their office, and he tottered to the edge of his cot and sat down exhausted, his head falling forward upon the table. Another attack of nausea had supervened; he asked for water, and drank three ounces.

At 3:05 P. M. he recovered slightly, and tried to write a little. But this did not last 10 minutes. At 3:50 P. M. he had returned to his cot, and was asking for a draught of carbonic acid water to relieve his nausea. He lay there, with the exception of rousing himself to ask for an extra blanket, until 7 P. M., when Drs. Danielson and Hofmann relieved Drs. Wark and Pelroz. He was irritable and peevish, complained that the rubber pillow hurt his ears, and insisted that the towel was rough and of bad texture.

At 8:40 he was again seized with uncontrollable nausea, and ejected about one and a half ounces of mucous slime, tinctured with the greenish secretion of the liver. At his own request his cot was now moved away from the window, and in a few minutes he was again sleeping quietly, with a respiration as regular and as free from spasmodic symptoms as that of a school-boy. His physicians entertained a vague hope last night that he would wake up restored this morning, but this hope was evidently a very remote one. The thyroid indication, if it shows slight rise in pulse showed anything, betokened slight fever, and his skin, it may be added, had become as dry and harsh as it was previous to the alcoholic vapor bath taken on Wednesday night.

At 10:15, when Drs. Goodman, Osborne, and McMasters, of the regular school, arrived, they found Dr. Tanner vomiting violently. He ejected about one ounce of a thick, viscid fluid of the color of weak tea, with small fragments of tissue having the appearance of decomposed mucous membrane floating upon the surface. The fluid was very bitter to the taste, and emitted a nauseous and disagreeable odor. The effort of vomiting appeared to prostrate him extremely. When the paroxysm subsided he asked for a mustard plaster, which was immediately procured and applied to the epigastric region. The form of plaster used was the London preparation, vapor only to be pulverized thoroughly before being applied. The vapor was applied at 10:40 and at 10:45 Dr. Tanner was resting quietly in his cot, but not asleep, and his gastric symptoms were subsiding. At 11:20 the plaster was removed and Dr. Tanner drank three ounces of carbonic acid water. At midnight he was quietly sleeping.

THE BLACKSMITH PREACHER.

PREACHING SERMONS AND FIGHTING RUFFIANS AT PACKER'S ISLAND CAMP-MEETING.

FLEMINGTON, N. J., July 31.—A camp-meeting has been in session for a week on Packer's Island, a woodland spot on the South Branch of the Raritan River, about two miles from here, and named on account of its proximity to the Lehigh Valley Road, built by Asa Packer. Other exercises than those of a religious character have been held, owing to the turbulence of a crowd of ruffians and drunken youths. These ruffians attempted to break up the meeting by firing stones at the speakers and endeavoring to perpetrate outrages about the tents and booths. Although apparently only harmless beverages were sold at the stands, it is understood that the more fiery articles were slyly dealt out to thirsty customers, thus adding to the disturbance. Last Saturday night was the most turbulent, as none of the officers were on the ground. Since then there has been less turmoil, although last evening witnessed several disgraceful sights.

One of the characteristic features of the camp has been the appearance of "Raif" Anderson, better known in this part of the State and in Pennsylvania as the "Blacksmith Preacher." "Raif" began life at the forge, and with more or less regularity has continued it ever since. He was a very profane and wicked man for many years, but professed a change under the ministry of a Methodist clergyman in Bucks County, and since then has gone around exhorting. He is a large, muscular person, and has an unusually powerful voice, penetrating the inmost recesses of the woods. He is very fearless in his manner and denunciations, and will not hesitate to enforce his arguments by fist as well as tongue. He has taken an active part in quelling the disturbances during the week, and many stories are told of his muscular Christian feats. It is said that "Raif" can shoe a horse, come out best in a fight, and preach a sermon with equal readiness and ease. Some of his converts give enthusiastic accounts of his discourses while sitting on the blacksmith's bench, or blowing the bellows for the furnace. He becomes very earnest in his depictions of the hereafter, and believes fervently in the gospel of fear and eternal fire. He has attracted large crowds, especially on Sunday.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

At about 2 o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out in the stables belonging to the Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs Company, some 400 yards west of the main hotel. There were at the time 46 horses in the stables, only 24 of which escaped. Forty-four horses, 20 of which belonged to the Springs Company, and the remaining 24 to guests here, were burned. The fire is supposed to have been the result of carelessness on the part of some of the colored servants. The building being an old one, and intended to be replaced by a new structure, was uninsured. No alarm was given, and only a few of the guests were aware of the conflagration until morning. The building was full of combustible material, and burned so rapidly that an opportunity to cut the horses loose was not afforded. Among the losers are Mr. Corcoran, the banker, who had three horses in the stable; Gen. Anderson, Col. Carrington, of Richmond, and a number of others. Arrangements have been made for a supply of new horses immediately, so that the business or pleasure of the guests will be uninterrupted.

A fire of supposed incendiary origin, at Paterson, N. J., at about 3 o'clock yesterday morning, destroyed a large portion of Grieves's Greenbrook and Paterson hot-houses, together with many choice plants at the nursery, corner of Willis-street and Vreeland-avenue. The loss is estimated at about $15,000; insured for $30,000.

The freight-house of the Old Colony Railroad, at Brocton, Mass., with a large quantity of freight, way bills, &c., was destroyed by fire on Saturday night. The loss is heavy.

PHASES OF CRIME.

CHICAGO, Aug. 1.—Michael Mackin was shot and fatally wounded at noon to-day by his brother William, while trying to enter the house of the latter. William, who is an industrious working man, lives with his wife, at No. 3,515 Lowe-avenue. About 9 o'clock, while he was absent from home, Michael went to his house in an intoxicated condition and abused his wife. On William's return his wife told him of his brother's conduct, which so incensed William that when Michael returned he refused him admission and shoved him down the steps. Michael made a rush at his brother, when William drew a revolver and beat him on the head with it. The men closed, and William began beating Michael with the revolver, when it was discharged, the ball lodging in Michael's groin. William was arrested, and Michael sent to a hospital, where, on recovering from his drunkenness, he said he thought his brother did not intend to kill him.

DANVILLE, Va., Aug. 1.—In an altercation between J. R. Oakes and R. L. Ramey, on the county road, seven miles from Danville, last night, Oakes was fatally stabbed. Ramey escaped. Both are mere boys, Oakes being 19 and Ramey 18 years old.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 1.—A special dispatch from Bullitt County, Ky., reports the killing of Turner Wilson by a pistol shot from Ben Johnson, at Saltown, last Friday. The men were at a political meeting, and quarreled about a bet. Johnson gave the lie, and Wilson drew a pistol, but was prevented from using it by John S. Fulton, who took the pistol from him. Johnson also drew, and upon Wilson attempting to disarm him fired the shot entering Wilson's abdomen. The wounded man died in a few hours. Johnson, who is the son of ex-Lieut-Gov. William Johnson, fled to his father's house, in Bardstown, concealed himself, and it is reported that the officers are afraid to attempt to arrest him.

BUFFALO, Aug. 1.—The Police last Friday arrested here two suspicious characters named Joseph J. Hart, alias Hyland, and Alice C. Lytel. It has since been learned that the latter is the person who robbed Mrs. Kate Isbel, of St. Louis, of $600 worth of jewelry at the Weller House, in Nashville, Tenn. Hart sold shirt patterns while Alice "worked" the hotels.

St. Paul, Aug. 1.—A special to the Pioneer Press says that three unknown men waylaid James Germain, looking for work near Lake City, fatally wounding one with a revolver, and robbing him of $40. An armed party of citizens pursued the robbers, and overtaking them, several shots were exchanged. The robbers finally escaped by swimming in the lake. Several parties are searching for them along the shore in boats. The wounded man's name is Anton Horenisch. At least one of the robbers was wounded in the fight with the pursuers.

THE RECORD OF ACCIDENTS.

UTICA, N. Y., Aug. 1.—Mary Ennis, 15 years of age, fell into the canal at Durhamville, in this county, to-day. Stephen Murry, 21 years old, her cousin, attempted to save her, and both were drowned.

Roman Syer, an employe on the Central Railroad, this afternoon, was run over and killed near Lyons-avenue.

FRAUDS OF THE BOURBONS

THE MATTHEWS-HOADLEY DISCUSSION IN OHIO.

EX-SENATOR MATTHEWS REVIEWS THE BLACK RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—JUDGE HOADLEY'S RECENT SPEECH ANSWERED—THE MAINE AND OREGON DECEPTIONS.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 1.—The fraud discussion between Judge Hoadley and ex-Senator Stanley Matthews was concluded at Clifton last night in a two hours' speech by Mr. Matthews. The ex-Senator treated of Democratic frauds in detail from Maine to Oregon and from Louisiana to New-York. He said:

Fraud, fellow-citizens, we are solemnly told will not be condoned, and my respectable and respected friend who presided over the Democratic Convention at Cleveland a short time ago [Theodore Cook] shook his finger at us and said, "You must not do it again, or ——." Well, he didn't say what, but then we know—Gen. Hancock's sword. [Applause.] Those gentlemen who are in favor of the supremacy of the civil authorities, who are terror stricken with the apparition of the silent man on horseback; who thought that statesmanship as it had been proved and tried by long experience of civil life, especially that statesmanship which consisted in a suppression of frauds in his own party, which was the reputation that Mr. Tilden made—those gentlemen now parade before us 138 Electoral votes of the solid South and the sword of Winfield S. Hancock, and a returning board consisting of the two houses of Congress, that they say will never again submit to any usurpation, because they have the power to have it their own way. And these are the paragons and pinks of political propriety that point the finger of scorn at us as if they could brand us with the word "fraud." Fraud—when, where, how, by whom? Fraud in the Second Congressional District of Ohio in 1876. [Applause and laughter.] Let Judge Hoadley explain the several thousand dollars that Smith Weed brought to Cincinnati and expended there. Let him get up before this intelligent audience and whitewash Mr. James White, who was convicted of taking the contract of repeating, in order to elect Gen. Banning. Let him rehearse to you the argument he made before the jury when he was defending Gus Clark, a Democratic Councilman, a man in authority, a man who sits with Judge Hoadley on committees, the representative of that Christian civilization that I understand Judge Hoadley says is embodied in the Democratic Party. But if this is treading on toes too close at home, what about the State of Maine? What about Dr. Garcelon? What about 37 members of the Legislature of the State of Maine that were lawfully elected, about whose seats there was no doubt, being deliberately counted out by falsified returns by the whole Democratic Party of the State of Maine in authority, the result of which would have been to revolutionize the political character of the General Assembly of that State, and turned every office of it into the hands of the Democratic and Greenback Fusion Party? Is there any doubt about these things? Is there any denial? Is there any question? Is there any apology? Is there any possible explanation? Why, no, fellow-citizens, they simply grin and don't even blush.

Now, Judge Hoadley did not tell you about Oregon either, [applause and laughter,] and yet he knew more about Oregon than he did about Louisiana, and that is the very reason he did not talk to you about it. [Renewed applause and laughter.] He did not want to tell what he knew; he only wanted to tell you what he didn't know. Now, I understand he says that I knew the true inwardness of the Louisiana business. I think I do. I know the the true inwardness of the Oregon business, too, and I am going to tell that first.

Mr. Matthews then reviewed the Oregon case in detail, and concluded:

"And now, then, against the expressed and well-ascertained and indubitably-known will of the majority of the people of the State of Oregon, and for the purpose of giving Samuel J. Tilden the one vote which he needed and hadn't got, Judge Hoadley solemnly proposed, and the Democratic Party outside of the Electoral Commission, so far as I know, unanimously seconded his proposition, that Mr. Tilden should be elected by Cronin's solitary vote interpolated and manufactured in that indecent way. I mean it and I am going to stand up to it. They proposed it, and it was argued at length in the newspapers and before the Electoral Commission that it was a right and proper and honest and lawful thing for that commission to do, acting as the organ of Congress, and to have Congress, following the judgment of that commission, count Cronin's vote in favor of Tilden and Hendricks, and on that solitary casting vote to have them inaugurated into office and inducted; and that stands off all by itself and is to be judged on its own merits as if there were no other question in the entire Electoral canvass, and that thing was urged with all the ability and with all the eloquence, and with all the learning of which Judge Hoadley was master, and, I may say, with all the earnestness of a man engaged in an honest and lawful cause. [Applause.] Now, fellow-citizens, suppose that this thing had in fact taken place; try and realize in your minds, try to feel how you might, could, would, or should have felt sitting here to-night under an Administration manufactured upon that principle. And now then, try one more impossible thing. Try and imagine the consistency of a man that will invent and prosecute and endeavor to effect that thing and then turn around and accuse anybody of fraud."

The speaker then reviewed at length the cases brought before the Electoral Commission from Southern States. He concluded as follows:

"In my opinion there is enshrined in the body politic of the Republican organization all there is good in our present political situation, and all the mischief and all the danger is in the Democratic Party. To my mind, the Republican Party embodies now, as it always has done, the great idea of our nationality, and I spell the word Nation with the biggest N. All there is in the unity of this people, all there is in the fraternity of these races that are to inhabit and cultivate and civilize this continent in its keeping, the keeping of this Nation in its own integrity and unity and greatness and power and glory, and in the idea of its nationality, is carried out by that political party which has upheld its banners and defended its flag and preserved its Constitution. In that to me lie the hopes of the world as they are to be developed on this continent.

GETTING SQUARE WITH A WOMAN.

In February last Officer Higgins, of the Fourteenth Precinct, was attacked one night by a gang of roughs, who kicked and stoned him until he was insensible, and then left him with a fractured skull. Ida Evans, a woman who had been repeatedly arrested by the Police, strove to save the officer, and though she did not succeed, she secured, through her testimony, the conviction of two of Higgins's assailants, who are now in State Prison. The associates of the convicted men vowed vengeance against the woman, and persecuted her in every way. On Saturday night, as she was walking in the street, she was met by Henry Jones, an ex-convict, and a friend of Officer Higgins's imprisoned assailants. He was accompanied by two females, Josephine Taylor and Mary Moore. Jones snatched a chain and locket worn by the girl Evans, and then she was beaten by the two women. Officer Eltrich rescued the girl and arrested Jones and the two females. They were all arraigned before Justice Duffy, in the Tombs Court, yesterday. The two women were fined $5 each, and Jones was held in $500 bail for trial.

ALMOST A COLLISION.

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia, Aug. 1.—Capt. Wrecken, of the schooner Winnifred, which arrived at Canso from the Banks yesterday, reports that when about 40 miles from Cape Canso a large brigantine came so near to running him down that they could have jumped on board of her. The name of the brigantine is not known.

A MODEL STEAMBOAT COLLISION.

From the London Telegraph.

In the story of the sinking of the Hydaspes, which was run into on Saturday afternoon in the Channel by a steamer called the Centurion, one thing strikes the reader which gives some satisfaction, and as are the general results of the collision. The sailors and the passengers alike, although a great proportion of the latter were ladies, kept so cool and acted so well that, notwithstanding only 10 or 11 minutes elapsed between the occurrence of the disaster and the destruction of the ship, not one was lost of the ninety people on board, and only two actually fell into the water. It is noted that while the sailors, by getting into the Centurion, managed to procure ropes and throw them to the sinking ship, not even one lady was observed to be assisted—indeed, or heard to make so much as a female exclamation for help, but that everybody worked with a will to save his or her friends, and that the Captain and his officers were the last to leave the unfortunate vessel. It is pleasant to know that British coolness and pluck have again vindicated themselves, and that 90 lives have been saved by the exhibition of these admirable national qualities.

THEY WANT AMERICAN BEEF.

AN EFFORT TO GET RID OF THE RESTRICTIONS ON THE IMPORTATION OF LIVE CATTLE INTO ENGLAND.

A very large and influential deputation, consisting of members of cattle-trade associations of the midland counties and north of England, had an interview with Earl Spencer and Mr. Mundella, at the Privy Council Office, on July 19, to urge upon the Government the desirability of taking off the restrictions imposed by the late Government on cattle imported from abroad, and from America particularly. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Jacob Bright, member of Parliament, and the arguments put forth in support of their wishes being complied with were that the present restrictions enhanced the price of meat to the British consumer 1½d. and 2d. per pound; that out of many hundreds of thousands of cattle and sheep imported into this country but very few suffered from either pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease; that at the ports of landing, where they were compelled to be slaughtered, the authorities were capable of detecting any such disease should it exist; and that under the present regulations as to the slaughtering of cattle at the port of debarkation, the offal and other nutritious portions of the animals were lost to the consumer, and vast numbers of persons were thereby deprived of food. Finally, they urged the Government to release the food of the people from the thraldom of what was practically a most unjust tax.

Earl Spencer, in reply, assured the deputation that he felt the deepest interest in the questions brought before him. He also appreciated the questions so far as they related to the food of large centres of industry in this country, and he warmly sympathized with the feelings which prompted the deputation to wait upon him. He had frequently had to deal with the subject of the importation of foreign live cattle, and had always endeavored to keep in mind the great principles of free trade which had always guided the wisest statesmen, whether with regard to the meat or bread supply of this country. He also knew the requirements of farmers, whose interests had to be considered as well as other people's, and that their prosperity tended to the prosperity of the interests which they specially represented. He had tried to do what was right between all classes, and he had always urged moderation on the farmers throughout the United Kingdom when they sought to introduce protection for their industry. With regard to the matter of dealing with the diseases of animals, he took on himself the sole responsibility for that important branch of the Government which the Privy Council represented, and he shielded Mr. Mundella from any participation in that responsibility. Having reviewed the history of the law bearing on the subject of the importation of foreign cattle, his Lordship proceeded to enumerate the list of countries which the latest reports to his department made it necessary for the Government to schedule, and said that they had no power of admitting foreign cattle from any country unless satisfied that that country was free from disease. With respect to the admission of cattle from America, it had been found that diseased animals were among those that were landed from that country, and the consequence was that that country had to be scheduled. His Lordship read an extract from the report of the highest veterinary scientist of America, who declared that pleuro-pneumonia did exist, and had done so for some time, throughout the States, and he declared, moreover, that the disease would be in the cattle for six weeks or two months without making its appearance, that the disease was of the most insidious kind, and that although it might escape attention at first it would at last do the greatest destruction. His Lordship reminded the deputation that whatever it was in a country situated in America was to secure proper protection from the ravages of the disease; and even if the West was perfectly free there was no guarantee that the East would be. If he were convinced that there were not sufficient regulations in America to arrest the disease there—and they had shown that there was not proper legislation to prevent it—he really could not, under the act of Parliament, modify the orders in Council regulating the importation of cattle from abroad. He read an extract from a Chicago newspaper to show how careless the system for the prevention of the spread of the disease was in America. Generally speaking, therefore, he could not alter or reverse the restrictions, which the late Administration in its wisdom deemed it wise to impose, although he should have been glad if he could have done so. He could not help feeling, however, that they might develop the dead-meat trade more than was done, and he urged that upon the attention of the trade. He should do all he could to make the administration of the laws as little onerous as possible to the meat-consuming population of the country. The deputation thanked his Lordship and withdrew.

SHERE ALI'S MUTINOUS TROOPS.

The correspondent of the London Times at Kandahar gives the following details of the engagement between Gen. Burrows' troops and the mutinous infantry of Shere Ali on July 14, a few days before the disastrous battle with Ayoob Khan: "On their arrival at Girishk, two things became apparent to Gen. Burrows and Col. St. John—first, that the river was so shallow as to be fordable at short intervals, and presented, therefore, no difficulty to the passage of the troops anywhere; secondly, that the Wali's troops were ready to mutiny at any time, having been corrupted by a veteran regiment which had accompanied the Wali from Kabul last year. This regiment at least, if not the the entire force, it was clearly necessary to disarm to prevent their joining Ayoob Khan, and for this purpose the Wali issued orders for the withdrawal of his force from the west to the east bank. After striking their tents and packing their baggage, soon after sunrise, his cavalry began to move, when the mutinous regiment suddenly seized the artillery, consisting of six 6-pounders, which were on the right bank, and called on the other regiments to join in driving the Wali and his cavalry across the river. The threat was sufficient, and the cavalry and the Wali withdrew to the east bank, where our troops were. The mutineers immediately seized and plundered the post and baggage, and began to move to the northward along the river bank. This was about 7 o'clock. At 10 o'clock a force from our camp on the west bank, four miles above that of the mutineers, crossed the river. In three-quarters of an hour the cavalry brought the mutineers to bay, and they formed a very respectable line of some 2,000 men along the low cliffs overlooking the river valley, here over two miles wide; but before the guns and infantry could get up they moved off a mile and formed a second line at right angles to the river, with the guns next to it. On the cavalry approaching these opened a smart fire for some 30 minutes, doing, however, no damage, owing to the bad elevation. At 12:30 our guns, which had been delayed by the difficulty of passing the irrigation channels, came into action, and in a quarter of an hour the mutineers abandoned their guns and disappeared. The cavalry immediately took possession of the guns, when a smart fire was opened on them by a number of infantry, who were concealed among the rocks and in the cultivated ground below. These were soon dislodged, except a few Ghazis, who held a wall for some time, and the whole force of mutineers was seen flying in every direction and abandoning the baggage. The cavalry pursued them for a short distance, but were soon recalled, owing to the necessity of taking measures to bring back the captured guns to the camp, which was successfully done. The mutineers' loss was about 50 killed, of whom 46 were buried. Our loss was four men of the 59th-Regiment wounded. The mutineers are said to be completely dispersed and disheartened, only a small portion of the regiment which first mutinied going off toward Herat. The remainder fled in twos and threes to their homes."

THE FRENCH REPUBLICAN LEADER.

A Paris correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette writes: "A very grand head is Gambetta's. The lines are ample, and express power at its ease. About the temples and over the eyes the development of the forehead is abnormal. Gambetta's superiority is not of a kind to awake jealousy. It is very manifest, but it is so unalloyed with egotism, and it is so softened by good-fellowship, that a man of talent, who feels small in the presence of the great tribune, does not for that feel humiliated. Gambetta enjoys companionship more than 'society,' as 'society' is understood in our time. He likes clever women if they are unaffected, and he does not believe a woman's conversation can charm a man of intellect unless it is the outcome of much study, observation, and long-sustained mental efforts. The professional beauty would be neglected by him unless her loveliness were lighted up by wit. Gambetta leaves for Ville d'Avray to-day. He has there a garden about twice the size of his dining-room in the Palais Bourbon; but it is in a district of national parks and woods, in which he breathes at his ease, and walks until he is ready to drop from fatigue."

A SLUGGISH COUNTRY.

From the London Telegraph.

There is a story told of a tourist who, happening to be at Lisbon, was present one day at a sitting of the Cortes. The lower chamber was debating the clauses of a bill for reimbursing a provincial Postmaster, whose mules had been stolen by a gang of gypsies. The traveler left the Tagus and sailed to Callao; thence he went to Paraguay, and some months later he was in California. He crossed the American continent to New-York, then proceeded to England, and at the expiration of about 18 months he turned up again at Lisbon, where he found the Cortes still gravely deliberating over the bill indemnifying the Postmaster of Tras os Montes for the loss of his mules, the moral of which manifestly is that Portugal, although apparently so peaceful and so prosperous that she is scarcely ever heard of, is an extremely sluggish and backward country.

DEATH OF A BANK PRESIDENT.

PITTSBURG, Aug. 1.—Samuel George, Jr., 51 years of age, a prominent citizen, died to-day after a lingering illness. He was President of the Peoples' and Mechanics' Banks, and was said to be the wealthiest bank President in the United States.

IRISH GOSSIP OF THE DAY

SOMETHING ABOUT LORD POWERSCOURT'S HEIR.

A BABY WHO IS MAKING A NOISE IN THE WORLD—SCHEMES FOR REFORMING THE LAND TENURE—ROYAL COMMISSIONS AT WORK—A SLIGHT TO THE VICEROY.

DUBLIN, July 20.—It is a tolerably well known fact that a comparatively small number of persons have more money than they know what to do with, while the moneyless millions seldom have a silver coin that they can call their own. A childless pauper, with a wife, is almost unknown; childless peers, with wives, may be reckoned by the hundred. For 16 long years the Lord of Powerscourt had been without an heir to his title and vast estates. Not even a daughter blessed his Lordship's marriage. This nobleman was born in the year 1836. He has been an Irish peer since he was 8 years old, when his father died, and from that period of his life until he attained legal manhood, at one and twenty, he was a ward of the Court of Chancery, and by the time he became of full age the accumulated income of his estates reached a very large figure. At 18 years of age he entered the Army as an officer in the First Life Guards. He has been a mighty hunter in the Indian jungles, and, after the usual dashing career of an enormously rich young patrician, he settled down in life in the year 1864, when he married the eldest daughter of the Earl of Leicester. The family mansion is in the romantic County of Wicklow, where the Powerscourt property is situated. During all the long years from that time to this the noble pair have been childless. Suddenly, society was startled by the announcement that a son and heir had been born in London to the House of Powerscourt. Great, of course, are the rejoicings over the happy event. Bonfires burned on the Wicklow hills in honor of the illustrious little stranger, who was so long looked for that all hope of his coming had been abandoned years ago; and at the present writing the tenantry on the Irish estates are drinking the health of the distinguished infant, and are hard at work composing a congratulatory address to my Lord and lady. If that precious baby should die, the bereavement of the father and mother would be something inexpressible; but the latest accounts represent the nobleman in miniature as quite a lusty lordling. Lady Powerscourt is about 35 years old. His Lordship, now in his forty-fourth year, is a fine-looking man, over six feet high. Some years ago he lost one of his eyes through a gun accident when out fowling. A strange coincidence in connection with the birth of an heir to him is talked of much. In the newspapers of the day announcing, with suitable editorial felicitations, the birth of baby Powerscourt, papa Powerscourt is mentioned as having, on the previous evening, in his place in the House of Lords, brought up a bill regulating the registration of births and deaths in Ireland.

If the very vexed question of land tenure in Ireland is not "settled" soon, once for all, it will not be for lack of royal commissions of inquiry into the subject. A royal commission is now trying to make out the cause of the agricultural depression in the United Kingdom and how far the existing system of land-tenure, &c., has connection with it, if at all. While this commission is in full swing a smaller royal commission has been called into existence to inquire and report as to what amendments are necessary to improve the existing legal relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and whether it is expedient to assist tenants in the purchase of their farms. This commission is very mixed as regards the members composing it. The difficult and delicate task of piloting it as Chairman has been undertaken by an Irish peer—Lord Bessborough—whose father was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland during the Irish famine of 1847. His fellow-laborers over the land trouble will be The O'Conor Don, some time member for Roscommon County, but who was ejected from the representation at the late general election because he wasn't sufficiently pronounced on the land question; Mr. William Shaw, member of Parliament for Cork County, who is a moderate Home Ruler and Land Reformer; Mr. Kavanagh, formerly member of Parliament for Carlow County, who was ejected from the representation because he is a landed proprietor who objects to be abolished, and Judge Dowse, who, at one period of his life, was accepted as a rough-and-ready democratic lawyer. Since his elevation to the Irish Bench, however, he has been trying, with more or less success, to sober himself down. Of course, this mixed commission will succeed only in displeasing all parties interested in the land question in Ireland.

The very strong feelings of anger with which the Irish landed nobility and gentry regard what they feel is a policy of confiscation attempted to be applied to them by the land legislation of the present Government have just been manifested in a decided manner. The peripatetic society called the "Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland" will hold its annual exhibition next month in Clonmel, the chief town of the County of Tipperary. It is usual for the local committee to invite the Viceroy of the

THE VERY NARROW ESCAPE OF AN EXCURSION TRAIN.

SATURDAY NIGHT'S COLLISION ON THE LONG ISLAND RAILROAD—AN ENGINEER KILLED AND SEVERAL PERSONS INJURED—A CONDUCTOR'S STRANGE ACT.

Twenty railroad laborers were busy yesterday picking up big lumps of coal and raking up large and small scraps of iron on the scene of the accident on the Long Island Railroad, that was reported in yesterday's TIMES. The collision was within a stone's throw of Morris Grove, a little station about a mile west of Jamaica. This branch of the road has a single track, but at Morris Grove there is a siding, with capacity sufficient for a long train. One of the excursion trains from Long Beach, consisting of five or six cars, left the beach at 9:05 P. M. on Saturday, and at Jamaica was divided, half of the train being switched off for Long Island City. The other half, consisting of two passenger cars and a combination smoking and baggage car, continued on its way to the Flatbush-Avenue Depot with about 100 passengers. It was drawn by locomotive No. 4, one of the heaviest engines on the road, named the Flushing. Samuel Allen was the conductor, William Wolcott the engineer, and John Sawyer the fireman.

At a little after 9 o'clock a local train for Jamaica left the Flatbush-Avenue Depot with one car, and only five or six passengers. This train was drawn by engine No. 83, the Bay State, a much lighter machine than the Flushing. John Wolcott, a brother of William Wolcott, was the engineer, and James Lestrange, an old and trusted employe of the road, was the conductor. This train was 10 minutes behind time. The Long Beach train had the right of way, and it was the business of Conductor Lestrange to run his train on the switch at Woodhaven, the first station west of Morris Grove, to allow the Long Beach train to pass. For some unaccountable reason he did not do this. Although he was behind time he thought he could reach Morris Grove, and went on. When his train reached Morris Grove it slacked up slightly, and Conductor Lestrange jumped off on the platform. He says he thought the engineer had merely overrun the station, and would back up. But the train did not stop. It went on, leaving the conductor standing on the platform.

There is a sharp curve at Morris Grove, and the engineer of the local train could not see many feet ahead. When he rounded the curve he saw the Long Beach train coming straight for him under full headway. The passengers in both trains heard the engineer's whistle down brakes, felt the sudden reversing of the engines, and a second later found themselves scattered all about the cars. There had been a terrific collision between the two engines. Both firemen had jumped from the cabs, but both engineers stuck to their posts. It was over in a second. The collision extinguished all the lights, and for a few moments the passengers could not learn what was the matter. Lights were soon procured, and then it was found that, although the passenger cars were all intact, both locomotives were broken to pieces. The heavy engine of the Long Beach train swept down upon the lighter engine of the local train like an avalanche, and turned it over. The "Bay State" engine, before the collision, was headed eastward, after the collision it lay on its side across the track, heading north. One end was in the wood, and the coal was scattered about on both sides of the track. While the dazed passengers and train men were searching among the ruins they heard groans under the overturned engine, and soon came upon the engineer, lying under his engine, terribly injured, and almost dead. They drew him out and carried him into the grove. He was almost disemboweled, but retained his senses. John Sawyer, the fireman on the Long Beach engine, had formerly been a fireman on the engine with William Wolcott, and was well acquainted with him. As he went forward with a dim light the dying man recognized him.

"Are you badly hurt?" Sawyer asked, kneeling down by his late companion.

"No, not very," Wolcott replied. He then put his hand in one of his pantaloons pockets, drew out his pocket-book, and handed it to Sawyer. He next took off his watch, and gave that also to Sawyer. He began to feel that the end was near.

"Give my watch to my little brother," he said. He was about to say something about the money, but could only groan.

"I guess it's all over with me," he whispered. His hands involuntarily went up above his head, he turned his face to one side, and was dead.

It was strange that two brothers should be the engineers of the two engines that crashed into each other. John Wolcott, who had charge of the Long Beach engine, was badly cut on the forehead and on the back of the head, and injured in the side, but was able to walk. Both the firemen, who sprang off, escaped without serious injury. The only injured persons besides the two engineers were William McDonough, a brakeman, who was cut about the head, and Samuel Allen, conductor of the Long Beach train, who came out of the accident with one broken rib and some internal injuries. Two of the passengers, Mr. and Mrs. Egan, of Brooklyn, were bruised by the concussion, and a number of other passengers received slight contusions. The track was blocked for less than an hour. Some of the wreck was cleared away, and trains went past on the switch. The passengers were all taken to Jamaica, and were forwarded to Brooklyn at 12:30 yesterday morning. The only injury to any of the cars was a broken rail on one of the platforms. The wonderful escape of the cars, and consequently of the passengers, is ascribed to the "buffing and coupling" arrangement in use on all the cars of the Long Island Railroad, which renders it impossible for two cars to telescope. Two heavy beams, with buffer-springs on the ends, run under each car the entire length. When there is a collision the ends of these beams meet, the force of the concussion is somewhat broken by the stiff springs, and the cars are uninjured.

The entire blame of the accident is laid upon Conductor Lestrange, of the local train. His action in going ahead, when he knew that another train was coming in an opposite direction on the same track, is considered unaccountable, and the officers of the road discredit his statement that he expected the engineer to stop at Morris Grove, when he jumped off. Even if this story is true, however, it is no excuse for him, the officers say, for it was his business to see that the train was stopped and properly switched. The battered locomotives were taken to Jamaica yesterday, where they were examined by many curiosity-hunters.

One of the other engineers of the Long Island Railroad yesterday thought that Wolcott might have saved his life by jumping from the engine. "I was in a little trouble on an engine once," said he, "and stuck to the cab, but I never would do it again. I would rather jump and take my chances. It gives an engineer a reputation for great bravery to stick to his engine, and if he is killed he is a hero. But it does no earthly good. After an engineer has reversed his steam there is nothing more in the world that he can do, and he might as well save himself if he can."

Coroner William D. Wood, of Jamaica, impaneled a jury yesterday and made an examination of the engineer's body. The inquest will be held in the Town Hall, Jamaica, beginning at 7 o'clock this evening. William Wolcott, the engineer who was injured, went to his house in East New-York yesterday.

MANKIND ALWAYS WISHING.

DR. CROSBY SUGGESTS THE FORMULATION OF A NEW SYSTEM OF DESIRES.

The Rev. Howard Crosby, D. D., preached yesterday morning to an unusually large and closely attentive congregation. He took for a text the fourth verse of the thirty-seventh Psalm: "Delight thyself in the Lord and He shall give thee the desires of thy heart." Dr. Crosby said one of the most constant occupations of the people of this world was wishing. The boy wished he was a man; the man wished he was a boy again; the poor wished they were rich; the rich wished that they were poor; the noble wished they were Kings, and the Kings wished that they might be freed from care. The gratification of every desire was undoubtedly the sentiment of perfect happiness, but where was it to be found? The world had never given an example of completely gratified desire, and as a merely worldly application it could not be found. There was, however, a way in which it might be realized through Christian faith, and this was the solution of all that the philosophers had been in search of for 40 centuries, with the whole world of the Bible. When they had fitted men for heaven, the wheels of our present society, which is on the river and mercury, would be ready for the Millennium, for Sunday-a new system of desires. The adoption of a new set of wants and aspirations would be akin to the taking in of a new heart; a new heart was the first step toward conversion, and conversion was the road to the realization of desire. This was the condition and attitude of the true Christian. The discontented Christian had not found this peace and rest—he was only a very poor specimen of a very noble class. To win contentment it was necessary to delight in God, and delight in Him implied and required reliance on Him, communion with Him, and consecration to Him. Through this alone could the heart and mind of man be gratified in all their desires.

FIRE ON THE ATLANTIC DOCKS.

PROMPT WORK BY BROOKLYN FIREMEN AND IMPERILED PROPERTY SAVED.

Louis Herwig, engineer of the Cereals Manufacturing Company's mills, Nos. 5 and 6 Atlantic Docks, Brooklyn, went into the engine-room at 8:30 A. M. yesterday for the purpose cleaning and adjusting the machinery. After attending to his duties he walked through the building, and, not finding anything wrong, locked the door through which he had gained admittance, and left. About 10:30 o'clock, not long after his departure, Policeman Cullen, of the Third Precinct, in whose post are included North Pier, the Atlantic Docks, and the lower part of Hamilton-avenue, the three thoroughfares surrounding the mills and adjoining warerooms, noticed wreaths of yellowish smoke issuing from between the closed iron shutters and the stone window copings on that part of the third floor fronting the East River. Knowing that the entrance to the office of the Cereals Manufacturing Company is on the short street known as the North Pier, Cullen ran around in that direction. On his way he met Herwig and William Banks. The three men immediately entered the building, but were prevented from going up stairs by the blinding smoke, which seemed to have penetrated every part of the structure. Cullen then sounded an alarm, which brought three engines to the scene.

Chief Nevins saw at a glance that the flames had gained considerable headway and that a large force of engines would be required to combat them. He therefore sent out a second alarm, which was answered by five additional engines and several hook and ladder companies. Three of the former were stationed on the dock, directly in front of the buildings, and others drew up beside hydrants located in Hamilton-avenue and the adjacent streets. By this time crowds of people had been attracted by the fire. A large detachment of Police kept them at a distance, leaving the firemen plenty of room to work in. The task of raising ladders and forcing open the iron shutters was soon accomplished. Several powerful streams were then poured into the building, the two uppermost floors of which were completely at the mercy of the fire. The draft created by the opening of the shutters at both ends drove the flames in the direction of the North Pier, and it was not until they had penetrated to the second floor that the fire companies, who were enabled to work in front and rear, began to get them under control. At 1:30 P. M. the fire was completely extinguished. Chief Bates, of the New-York Fire Department, and the propeller Havemeyer were drawn to the fire by an exaggerated report sent to this City to the effect that four of the warehouses on the docks were on fire.

The Cereals Manufacturing Company is a stock concern, whose office is at No. 83 Murray-street, in this City. The principal holders of stock are S. P. Scheffin and Russell Stebbins, Jr. Owing to the absence of those gentlemen from the City it was impossible yesterday to obtain anything like an exact estimate of the losses and the insurance. The Police estimate the loss on the building at $4,000, and that on stock at $5,000. Engineer Herwig insists that the total loss is much larger than the aggregate of these sums. Expensive machinery was, he says, scattered throughout the building, and there was an unusually large stock of oat-meal and flour on hand. The principal articles manufactured by the company are "breakfast cereals," flour, and steam-cooked oat-meal. The building is one of a long row of granite four-story structures, the majority of which are owned by the Atlantic Docks Company. Mr. Scheffin, it is said, owns the one in which the fire occurred. F. E. Pinto occupies several as bonded warehouses. R. Edson & Co., of this City, have stored in one of them 24,000 bushels of malt and 14,000 bushels of oats, which were damaged to the extent of about $3,000 by water. The Atlas Flour Mill, owned by C. A. Barnes and George W. Corwin, lost about $2,000 by damage to wheat. Barnes & Co. are insured for $5,000 in the Bowery, Westchester, and Williamsburg Insurance Companies. It is believed that the fire originated in the drying-room of the cereals mill, but from what cause no one can tell.

While the fire was in progress, a boy, 11 years old, named Johnnie Johnson, of No. 61 Summit-street, climbed up on the rack of the Hamilton Ferry slip to watch the firemen. A few minutes afterward the ferry-boat New-York entered the slip, and as it struck the rack the jar threw the boy off. As he fell, his head caught between the rack and ferry-boat and was crushed to a jelly, killing him instantly. The body dropped into the water and was recovered by the fireman of the ferry-boat.

CLEVER, BUT UNSUCCESSFUL.

THE DODGE WHICH A BURGLAR TRIED TO PLAY UPON A POLICEMAN.

Among the prisoners arraigned before Justice Murray, at the Jefferson Market Police Court, yesterday morning, was a bright-eyed, sharp-featured man, neatly and respectably attired, and whose age might be guessed at something between 35 and 50. This man, whose appearance was well calculated to deceive, was Richard Allen, and the charge against him was burglary. The details of the crime are as follows: George F. Pusch keeps a lager beer saloon and restaurant at No. 87 West Twenty-eighth-street. Edward Theu, a young German, sleeps in a small room in the rear of the saloon, and not directly connected with it. It was his duty to go to Mr. Pusch's residence every morning, obtain the keys to open the saloon, and proceed to clean it up. He arose at 6 o'clock yesterday, and went to his employer's residence for the keys, as usual. When he returned in about half an hour he found that a side door leading from the hallway into the saloon had been forced open, and, on entering the place, saw Allen behind the bar in the act of rifling the money-drawer. As Theu entered, Allen turned about quickly and made for the door. Theu attempted to intercept him, whereupon Allen picked up a table-knife from one of the tables and threatened to stab him if he persisted in his interference, and he also threatened to blow Theu's brains out. Theu drew back, and Allen bolted through the door into the street and ran off toward Sixth-avenue.

Theu started in pursuit, crying "Stop thief." When near Sixth-avenue, Allen met Patrolman Reeder, of the Twenty-ninth Precinct, and immediately slackened his pace, and sauntered leisurely along, notwithstanding that Theu and several other persons were in full cry behind him. The officer, had, however, already noticed Allen, and was, therefore, not deceived by the clever ruse. He arrested Allen, and on searching him at the station-house found in his possession $12 in money, a pair of gold sleeve-buttons, and several other small articles, stolen from Mr. Pusch's money-drawer; also the table-knife with which he had threatened Theu, a chisel, and two very small "jimmies," such as are used for breaking open desk drawers. After the formal complaint had been taken, and while Justice Murray was examining the witnesses, Allen stepped up to the desk and said quietly to the magistrate: "This is all unnecessary, Judge; I desire to waive all examination and be committed for trial." "But," queried the magistrate, "have you an idea of the gravity of the charge here preferred against you?" "Oh! yes," answered Allen. "I have a good idea of it; it is a penal offense." "Where do you live?" asked Justice Murray. "In Louisiana," promptly replied the prisoner, and in the coolest manner possible added, "I am only temporarily stopping in this City at a boarding-house, and you must really excuse me, Judge, but I have quite forgotten the street and number." The Justice smiled at the nonchalance of the prisoner, and ordered his formal examination to be taken, in which Allen said that he was 45 years of age, a native of Louisiana, and a harness-maker. He was committed to prison in default of $5,000 bail.

THRONGS OF VISITORS AT ALL THE POPULAR RESORTS ON THE BEACH—EAST END QUIET AND WEST END CONFUSION—THE RUSH AT THE IRON PIER.

It would be impossible to say just how many thousands of men, women, and children were at Coney Island yesterday, but it is entirely safe to say that the number was large enough to make all the hotel and restaurant and bathing-house keepers happy. These purveyors of sea-side comforts and luxuries gazed admiringly at the crowds that poured in dense streams through hallways and breezy saloons, and declared that it was one of Coney Island's "great days." It was "great" for several reasons. The rush of visitors began early, continued late, and spent money freely all the time. The guests at the East End hotels enjoy the privilege of strolling upon the piazzas and along the beach during the quiet hours of the morning before the swarm of excursionists settles upon the shore. Yesterday morning the transient visitors made their appearance in sudden throngs before the permanent dwellers had finished their promenades, their number increased with amazing rapidity toward noon, and by 8 o'clock there was a crush from West Brighton to Manhattan Beach. The weather was as delightful as could be desired. Passengers who went to the beach by way of the ferry across the Bay, and then by rail, sailed down to Bay Ridge in the face of an invigorating breeze that tossed the water into white-capped waves and sent myriads of sail-boats and yachts skimming and careening gayly by. The sun shone with somewhat too fervent heat early in the day, but when the boats were carrying their heaviest loads there were occasional clouds that veiled the sun and tempered its scorching beams. The ride by rail through the Long Island farms, with their interminable rows of thriving vegetables, was never more comfortable, except perhaps when the crowds were smaller, and passengers could observe the onion crop without being wedged so tightly in the seats that it was distressing to breathe. Inside passengers perspired freely and made feeble protests, but their neighbors who sat next the breezy sides of the cars laughed at them and good-naturedly told them to "keep cool" and get used to the discomforts inseparable from travelling.

At the hour when City Pastors were addressing the first words of morning service to slender congregations, the Rev. Dr. J. P. Newman opened the now regular religious service at the Manhattan Beach Hotel. His congregation filled the parlor, extended out upon the piazza, and far into the halls. It was more varied in character than that which gathers in his own church, but not less orderly or attentive. The music, led by Gilmore, was refreshing, although there was somewhat too much of the brass in it with which Coney Island is afflicted. Many of the congregation came from the Oriental Hotel, and when the services were ended they seemed glad to escape from the din and crush of Manhattan Beach, and get back to the comparatively quiet piazzas of the new house. The Oriental is rapidly becoming more finished in appearance within and without. The fresh-made lawns lack verdancy, but the solid walks in front of the hotel are agreeable to walk upon, being cooler than the plank walks that prevail elsewhere, and noiseless. There was at no time an uncomfortable or rushing crowd at this hotel, although every room in the house was filled. All the afternoon the double row of seats along the bulkhead was filled with people, who seemed to be satisfied to watch the incoming surf and to meditate in the invigorating ocean breeze, and not one complaint was heard that there was no brass band. The broad plank walk along the bulkhead between the Manhattan Beach Hotel and the Oriental is nearly finished, and furnishes a delightful promenade. Frequent visitors to Manhattan Beach notice that the crowds at the pioneer hotel have diminished since the new house was opened. Perhaps the crowds have diminished, but one of the managers of the Manhattan said yesterday, in conversation with a gentleman who was inquiring about the business at the island: "No hotel in New-York City makes as much money all the year round as we have made this season."

Whatever may be the case at Manhattan Beach, there has been no diminution of the throng at Brighton Beach, and from the Brighton Hotel west beyond the Iron Pier. The same tide of promenaders setting both ways and all ways at once; the same clatter of dishes going and coming. Waiters taking more orders in five minutes than they can fill in an hour. Hungry people watching eating people, and pouncing eagerly upon seats as soon as vacated. All this rush and crush will become intolerable, and are sure to result in the provision of greater facilities, and in better accommodations for the extraordinary business that has been developed. The Concourse, from Brighton Beach to Vanderveer's, was thronged with carriages from 3 o'clock until dark. Up and down the broad walk that follows the road went a steady stream of promenaders, and along the beach there was another double line, emerging from the vast crowd at West Brighton, and spreading out in various directions, no one could tell exactly where, all the way down to Point Breeze. The throng at West Brighton one soon discovers to contain a greater proportion of juveniles than that at any other point. The reason is plain enough. At West Brighton the lunch tables, exhaustless cows, soda fountains, fat women and thin men, merry-go-rounds, brass bands, velocipedes, donkeys, and other things, more or less delightful and entertaining, abound as they do not abound elsewhere. They were all freely patronized yesterday, and their proprietors are richer to-day for the patronage.

People who were predicting, a year ago, that the Iron Pier could never be made a profitable investment would have changed their minds, yesterday, if they could have spent an hour or so upon it, observing the arrival and departure of boats and the endless tramping back and forth of thousands who came and went from the pier. Every boat from this City after 10 o'clock in the morning carried all the passengers the law would allow. The pier was quite as full during the afternoon as anybody who happened to be there wished to see it. Departure from the pier at night was not made without some disagreeable crowding, which seemed to be taken in very good humor by the crowders and the crowded. There were several hundred people on the pier at 7 o'clock who deliberately allowed one boat to go away without them in order that they might see Idalette, a woman in tights and red trunks, and Wallace, a man in tights and green trunks, risk their necks in trapeze performances, and afterward appear in a diminutive tank which contained just about enough water to cover them, in the characters of "The Mermaid and the "Man-Fish." The Nelly White, which left the pier at 8:30 o'clock, was so crowded that passengers pulled down life-preservers from their racks and used them for seats, and her load was so heavy that, as the boat rolled in the swell off Coney Island Point, one guard or the other was under water, and the spray made by the waves that dashed against her sides was thrown in showers upon passengers on the hurricane deck. It took her an hour and a half to run from the pier to the foot of Rector-street.

ROCKAWAY'S MANY VISITORS.

THE BIGGEST CROWD OF THE SEASON—ALL READY FOR BROOKLYN SOLDIERS.

There are certain classes in New-York who regard Rockaway as the ideal sea-side resort, and they cling to it notwithstanding the counter-attractions presented by Coney Island, Long Branch, Long Beach, and other resorts. The crowds at the beach yesterday were larger, it was claimed, than on any day since the opening of the season, and extra trains and extra boats had to be run at night to carry away the visitors. Everywhere people seemed to be enjoying themselves, and the proprietors of booths and peddlers of small holiday wares reaped a rich harvest. All that human ingenuity could devise to invite the expenditure of money was exhibited most temptingly. The shore was dotted along its entire length with promenaders. In the breakers the bathers tumbled about in merry knots, filling the air with their laughter and loud screams. Three-card monte men were on the beach, and thought they saw a fine opportunity to lighten the pockets of the more foolish of the visitors. They set up their tables, and began to manipulate their three cards with bewildering rapidity. Four of their ware captured, and an official stop was put to gambling ventures.

Throngs of people stopped to wonder at the site of the new hotel. The Thirteenth Regiment of Brooklyn are to go into camp on the hotel grounds to-day, and yesterday the pretty rows of white tents glittered in the sun-light. Soldiers in uniform walked about in knots on the long piazza of the hotel, and others wandered among the tents. They were an advance guard to arrange matters so that everything will be in readiness for the body of the regiment. The camp is to be known as Camp Cornell. Its many rows of tents, affording accommodations for over 500 men, present a picturesque appearance. The veteran as well as the active members of the regiment are under orders to assemble at the armory in Brooklyn at 6:30 o'clock this morning. The regiment is expected to reach the camp, via the Long Island Railroad, by 9 A. M. According to the contract entered into with the proprietors of the big hotel, the members of the regiment were to have been fed in the hotel. The proprietors, however, are not prepared to carry out this part of the contract, and the men will receive their meals at the different hotels.

GLEN ISLAND.

THE GROWING POPULARITY OF THIS RESORT—YESTERDAY'S THRONGS.

Not less than 4,000 persons visited Starin's Glen Island, the new picturesque and well-ordered pleasure-ground in the pretty harbor of New-Rochelle, yesterday. The steamers Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas are the vessels of the regular line which Mr. Starin has put on the Glen Island route, but yesterday the commodious steamer Erastus Corning was taken off the New-Haven Line, and made one trip to and from Glen Island in order that the rush of pleasure-seekers might be accommodated without overcrowding any of the steamers or exceeding the number of passengers which the law authorizes them to carry. The Laura M. Starin made three round trips, the St. Nicholas four and the Erastus Corning one. The first and last-named vessels on their final home trips were crowded to repletion, however, in consequence of the fancy that 90 out of every 100 Sunday excursionists have for staying over for the last boat and it seems as if there is no way of preventing this crowding of vessels unless a whole fleet of steamers is kept in readiness to carry away all those who choose to linger to the last. Of course, it is no wonder that people who spend a day at Glen Island seek as many hours of recreation as they can and are then loath to leave it. It offers such a delightful variation from the sea-side resorts that one can't help being fascinated by it. Its long stretches of lawn and meadow, everywhere shaded by trees of luxuriant foliage, are in marked contrast to the aching glare of sun and sea and sand, and they seem to afford actual relief and rest. The elevation of the ground, too, is so great that every passing breeze is caught, and it is an easy matter to ramble along the well-graveled walks instead of wading along in sand, ankle-deep, as must be done at the sea-side.

Glen Island is a sort of Summer nook in which those who visit it can fancy they have dropped out of sight and sound, and beyond the influence of the red-hot, sweltering City, and removed from the liability of being overrun with crowds from other resorts. When people are at Glen Island they are nowhere else. It is not as at Coney Island, where the Manhattan Beach crowd rolls in on the Brighton Beach crowd, and the throngs from these and the other "beaches" are continually intermingling, and each adding to the discomforts of the other. Glen Island is alone. There is rest, exclusiveness, quietude, order liness, almost seclusion, there; and yet there is at all times sufficient of a crowd to make the place cheery and interesting. Overcrowding is impossible. Those who wish to do so, even when there are 3,000 or 4,000 people on the island, may sit on a rustic lounge under the trees, along the sedgy shore, or on the lawns, and be as undisturbed as if they were at a farm-house by themselves. Others who prefer the excitement of seeing a crowd of well-dressed people changing and grouping, and changing again, like the never-repeated pictures of a kaleidoscope, may sit on the cool breeze-swept piazzas of the hotel, in the Venetian arbors that here and there crown some grassy knoll or wave-washed little promontory, or they may promenade the walks and bridges and look at the whirl of dancers in the pavilion and the fleet of steamers and sailing craft that seems to be forever flitting about.

Yesterday the hotel was liberally patronized in all its departments, but the large dining-room set apart for the serving up of baked clams—Rhode Island fashion—was crowded as long as the clams lasted, a period of about six hours. A large staff of courteous waiters was in attendance there as well as on the piazza restaurant, and it was quite noticeable that no compaints were to be heard among the people who patronized the place, either as to the prices, the quality of the fare, or the manner of serving it. Glen Island owes no small part of its prosperity to the fact that the management set out at the beginning to make Glen Island a select social and family resort, and that they have done nothing since it was opened which should lower the standard of their aims. Glen Island was opened to the public on June 15, and up to this time it has been visited by over 120,000 persons, the average on week days being about 2,000.

LONG-SUFFERING CITIZENS.

THE SIXTH-AVENUE ELEVATED RAILROAD AND ITS MANY TORTURES.

The Sixth-avenue elevated railroad is rapidly becoming an unmitigated nuisance. The managers appear to have grown reckless, and to have abandoned even the pretense of serving the interests of the public. The inconvenience to which the passengers of the road are compelled to submit is small when compared with the annoyance caused residents along the line from Rector-street to Harlem. The pungent odor of the coal-gas emitted by the locomotives penetrates sleeping apartments, while the snorting and puffing of the machines makes sleep a matter of impossibility. The engineers are always either getting up steam or discharging a surplus quantity. When steam is being made the fan is set in motion, and a rumbling like a small earthquake, only more steady and more prolonged, jars the nerves. When there is too much steam on the safety-valve hisses and sings like a huge tea-kettle. As if the old clumsy engines were not sufficiently noisy, the Directors have put on a number of new engines somewhat similar to those used on the New-York Road and combining all of their objectionable features. These locomotives have introduced a new noise, which penetrates the ear like a steam-whistle. An engineer of the road was asked yesterday whether it was not possible to prevent the latter style of shriek when coming into a station. He laconically answered, "Maybe it might," and when asked if there were any rules to be observed by engineers under such circumstances, he referred the questioner to the Superintendent. An elderly gentleman residing in West Fifty-third-street, when asked if he had become used to the elevated road, replied: "Don't ask me; if the thing were of wood I should sometimes be tempted to burn it down." He added that he never attempted "to go to sleep now until the last trains had passed over the road at night." Complaints are also made of the insufferable noise of the trains by persons residing several blocks away."

DIFFICULTY AT THE TUNNEL.

THE COFFER-DAM TO BE ABANDONED AND A CAISSON SUNK.

Work on the Hudson River coffer-dam at Jersey City was continued yesterday, but it did not appear to be prosecuted very vigorously. Although water made in the excavation pretty rapidly, the siphon was not in use, and the rotary pump was relied upon entirely. It was found necessary during the afternoon to put in cross-pieces to brace the supports. The men engaged in digging were up to their knees, and sometimes up to their waists, in water. The fact that the men were not working as men who had a distinct object in view, but rather as if they did not know what they were doing, and had little hope of accomplishing anything, was apparent to those who watched the proceedings closely, but it was not until late in the evening that any reason for such a course could be learned. Then one of the men in charge of a portion of the work stated to the reporter that the coffer-dam had proved impracticable, that they could go no further with it than they had for the reason that they could no longer control the waters. He said the quicksand in which the water came in was so fine that in 10 feet further down the workmen would be drowned out, and it was the intention to abandon the coffer-dam and sink a caisson inside the unused coffer-dam, using compressed air. A consultation of the tunnel engineers will be held this morning, and it is probable that the work of sinking a caisson will be entered upon immediately after the consultation.

FRUIT PROSPECTS AND PRICES.

AN ABUNDANCE OF PEACHES EXPECTED THIS WEEK—OTHER FRUITS AND VEGETABLES.

The quantity of peaches which will reach our markets this week will be much in excess of last week's supply, and, what is still more gratifying, the quality of the fruit will probably be much better. The Hale Early variety have all been shipped, and very few Troths remain in the orchards. The varieties which will mostly be sent here this week are the Early Yorks, Mountain Rose, and Early Crawfords. The last-named variety is a yellow peach, usually of good size, quite juicy, of delicious flavor, and, when in good condition, sells readily at prices far in advance of either the Yorks or Mountain Rose. The Early Yorks to come will be gathered principally in the upper parts of Kent and New-Castle Counties, Del., and in Kent and Cecil Counties, Md. This is the section in which peaches are most abundant this season, and the trees are generally very full. No very fine Early Yorks can be expected to come from there. But the Mountain Rose, which will come mostly from Queen Anne and Caroline Counties, Md., should be very good, and the Crawford's Early, from Sussex County, Del., and from the lower counties of Maryland, will certainly be very fine.

THE TIMES's prediction of last Monday that 75 car-loads would arrive in this City on the next day was not verified, as only about 54 car-loads came; but it was not because they were not produced, but because growers saw fit to change, in some instances, their shipping points from New-York to Boston, Hartford, Philadelphia, and other cities. There were shipped on last Monday from the Delaware Peninsula 70 car-loads of peaches, and the average for each day last week was about 75 car-loads. To-day there will be gathered and shipped by rail from the Peninsula upward of 125 car-loads of peaches, making about 60,000 baskets. Half of this quantity will arrive in this City to-morrow morning, and more than 30,000 baskets will be sent here each day this week. Fair eating peaches will be jobbed to retail dealers at about 50 cents per basket, and only fancy peaches will sell for more than $1 per basket. The keeping quality of the peaches which will arrive this week will be good, and any of them, with ordinary care, will keep for two or three days. There will also be a few peaches shipped from New-Jersey, but the quality will be indifferent.

Bartlett pears are coming in quite freely. There have been more grown in the South than was expected, and the quality is somewhat better than last year. They sold last week for about $3 per crate, of a bushel each, and this week they will not sell for less than $2 50, if the stock is good. Some are coming from along the Hudson River, where it is reported the crop is light. Other varieties of pears are plentiful enough to be in demand only at moderate prices, but there appears to be some reason for apprehending that the pear crop will be a short one.

While there may be some doubt as to the extent of the pear crop, there is none as to the apple crop. Never in the history of apple culture in this country has there been a more positive promise of an abundant yield. Gentlemen who for years have made the apple crop a study, and have confined their speculation almost exclusively to that fruit, report that after trips throughout the apple-growing regions of the States there is scarcely a tree to be seen that is not loaded with apples, and what is somewhat remarkable, the fruit itself is larger and finer than ever before known. Apples will be better and cheaper than ever before.

There is going to be an abundant plum crop. The fruit may be somewhat smaller than usual, owing to the extremely dry weather, but the flavor will be good and the quantity will be great. One grower on the Hudson is claiming for one variety—the Reine Claude—a crop of 1,600 barrels. Egg plums will arrive in large quantities this week, and as Sunday does not exist in the fruit season in many places along the Hudson River, there will be a good quantity of them in the markets this morning. They will be mostly bought up by the five or six rival fruit canners, and will sell for from $4 to $5 per barrel. By the last of the week green gages will begin to arrive, and, perhaps, some fine table plums, such as the Quackenbush, may come. Southern damsons are in the market, and sell at very moderate prices. They make good table dishes when cooked with plenty of sugar.

Blackberries, raspberries, and currants still linger in the markets, and sell for better prices than are usually obtained for that kind of fruit at this season of the year. Watermelons are arriving in great quantities; many cargoes are expected to arrive this week. The very finest of them—and none better have been in the markets for years—sell for from $40 to $50 per 1,000, and really good melons can be had for $20; while common stock scarcely brings the cost of transportation. Already several of the watermelon-dealers have exposed to view large and attractive-looking melons, labeled, "Grown expressly for Dr. Tanner." Keyport muskmelons, or, as the Jerseymen prefer to call them, "Citrons," were never better than this season, and there is going to be a very fine crop. There will be an abundance of them in the market this week, and by Saturday many barrels will be sold for less than $1 each.

The late vegetable crop will be a very abundant one. Irish and sweet potatoes were never better than this year, and the Northern and Eastern crops of the former are the greatest grown in many years. Tomatoes will be great abundance in a short time, and good Long Island stock will sell for less than 50 cents per bushel before this week is ended. Turnips, beets, carrots, and parsnips will be as cheap as ever, and lima beans, which seemed early in the season to be hopelessly destroyed by the drought, never looked more promising than now.

THE DOCTRINE OF ATONEMENT.

PURPOSES OF CHRIST'S TEACHINGS AND HIS DEATH OUTLINED BY DR. ORMISTON.

The Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, at the corner of Fifth-avenue and Twenty-ninth-street, was well filled yesterday by a congregation gathered to hear the Rev. Dr. William Ormiston. At the opening of the services the Pastor announced that the church would be open all Summer, excepting only the last Sunday in August and the first in September, and that the Collegiate Church at the corner of Fifth-avenue and Forty-eighth-street would also be open on those Sundays. Dr. Ormiston preached from the text John x :15: "I lay down My life for the sheep." Those who regard the cardinal doctrine of the Church as being the expiation of human guilt, said Dr. Ormiston, say the doctrine of atonement was not founded by Christ Himself, but by His Gospels. If this is the grand central doctrine of the Christian system, surely Christ would have taught it Himself. But if it is not taught in the Gospels, the omission would not neutralize the teachings of the Epistles, and in them the doctrine is taught most explicitly. Had Jesus said nothing, His silence would have been perplexing, but it would not have affected the testimony of Scripture to that central doctrine. He was the most impressive of teachers, but it was not so much His mission to teach as it was to redeem, to save the race—and it seems but natural and in the order of things that deeds should transpire before they would be recorded. The teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ were gradual and progressive. He first spoke in parables, and it was only toward the close of His ministry that He spoke to His Apostles of the doctrine which they seemed slow to comprehend. It is not true that He did not speak concerning the nature and object of His death. The fact is that when He died He died for the remission of sins, and that He taught explicitly both in regard to the necessity and object of His death. Jesus never speaks of His doctrines or of His miracles, but He does speak of His body broken for us and His blood shed for us for the remission of sins. His whole life was a revelation of the law and love of God, and it appeals to the heart and urges to repentance. His revelations of the life to come do awaken terror; they are well fitted to and do impress the conscience. The words of tenderness He has spoken and tears of compassion He has shed are well fitted to and do draw men to God. He never refers to these as if they were exemplified or endured for the remission of sins. He never says that His precepts or His example were designed for the remission of sins; they were merely for the guidance of our lives. But He does speak of His death as designed for this object. His death was voluntary. All the malignity and fiendishness of the Roman soldiery could have been scattered. Impelled by no other motive than the self-sacrificing love in His heart, He laid down His life. We cannot take one look at His life without being led by resistless logic to the cross and to His death.

Daniel Owens, age 10, was held for trial in the Harlem Police Court, yesterday, on the charge of attempting, in conjunction with three other boys of the same age, to steal a quantity of silverware from the private house No. 2,115 Fifth-avenue on Saturday afternoon. The others escaped arrest by scattering in different directions when pursued by Officer Jacoby, of the Twelfth Precinct.

Grush, a truckman, and his wife, Eliza, became involved in a drunken quarrel in their apartments, at No. 526 West Thirty-ninth-street, during which Grush struck his wife on the head with a sugar-bowl, causing two severe wounds. Grush was arrested, and on complaint of his daughter, Sarah E. Grush, he was committed to prison to await the result of the injuries.

Patrick Burns, of No. 111 East Nineteenth-street, was robbed on Saturday night of $80 in the restaurant No. 844 Third-avenue. He accused James Newman, of No. 329 Seventh-avenue, with taking the money from his pocket, while Abraham Strien and John J. Boyle held him and prevented his pursuing Newman. The three accused persons worked in the saloon, and, as alleged, conspired together to effect the robbery. In the Yorkville Police Court they were committed for trial in default of bail.

Patrolman Lorenzo Smalley, of the Tw
